The host of the Argives being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiaraus fled: of whom Amphiaraus is said to have been swallowed quick into the earth, neer to the River Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peradventure overwhelmed with dead carkasses, or drowned in the River: and his body never found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens; where sitting at an altar, called the Altar of Mercy, he made supplication for their aid to recover their bodies. For Creon having obtained the government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argives to be buried: but caused Antigone, the onely daughter then living of Oedipus, to be buried quick, because she had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did send forth an Army under the conduct of Theseus, which took Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argives to sepulture: at which time Evadne the wife of Capaneus threw her self into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her husband. But it little contented the sons of those Captains which were slain at Thebes, that any lesse revenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the City: wherefore ten yeer after, having levied forces, Ægialeus the son of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tydeus, Promachus of Parthenopæus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Euripylus of Mecisteus, marched thither under the conduct of Alcmæon, the son of Amphiaraus: with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victory, if Alcmæon were their Captain, whom afterward by another Oracle he commanded to kill his own mother.

When they came to the City, they were encountred by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battell, and slew Ægialeus, yet was he put to the worst, and driven to flie, or (according to Apollodorus) slain by Alcmæon. After this disaster, the Citizens began to desire composition; but in the mean time they conveyed themselves with their wives and children away from thence by night, and so began to wander up and down, till at length they built the Town called Estiæa. The Argives, when they perceived that their enemies had quitted the Town, entring into it, sacked it, threw down the walls, and laid it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Town was saved by Thersander the son of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to return, did there reign over them. That he saved the City from utter destruction, it is very likely; for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the War of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Jephta, and how the three hundred yeers which he speaketh of, Judg. 11.28. are to be reconciled with the places, Acts 13.20. 1 Reg. 6.1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

After the death of Jair (neer about whose time these things hapned in Greece, and during whose government, and that of Thola, Israel lived in peace and in order) they revolted again from the Law and Service of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than ever. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal and Astaroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen Nations adjoyning, and imbraced the Idols of the Aramites, of the Zidonians, Moabites, and Ammonites: with those of the Philistims. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Aramites, by the Amalekites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the * Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistims.

Judg. 10.

* The persecution of the Ammonites lasted 18. yeers, & ended in the yeer of the World 2820. in which yeer Jephta began, Jud. 11.

Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppresst, because they bordered upon upon the Ammonites, they were inforc't to seek Jephte, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base born; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of deviliſh hatred and revenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the War, upon condition that they should establish him their Governour after victory. And when he had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproved Ammons right, and fortified the Title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the war; and being strengthened by God, overthrew them: and did not onely beat them out of the Plains, but forc't them

*Judg.*11.33. over the mountains of Arabia, even to Minnith, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities expreſt heretofore in the description of the Holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the vain vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature he incountred, coming out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his own daughter, and onely childe, who with all patience submitted her self, and onely desired two moneths time to bewail her Virginity on the mountains of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that she was not offered, is more Bor. in Judg. probable, which Borbæus and others prove sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either envious of Jephta's victory, or otherwise making way to their future calamity, and to the most grievous slavery that ever Israel suffered, quarrelled with Jephta, that they were not called to the War, as before time they had contested with Gideon. Jephta hereupon is forced to defend himself against their fury, in the incounter slew of them 42000.
*Judg.*12. which so weakened the body of the Land, as the Philiſtims had an easie conquest of them all not long after. Jephta, after he had judged Israel six yeers, died: to whom 2925. succeeded Ibzan, who ruled seven yeers: after him Elon was their Judge ten yeers: in 2942. all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius finds not Elon, whom he calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Judge was omitted.

Now before I go on with the rest, it shall be necessary upon the occasion of Jephta's account of the times, *Jud.*11.28. (where he sayes that Israel had then possest the East side of Jordan 300. yeers) to speak somwhat of the times of the Judges, and of the differing opinions among the Divines and Chronologers: there being found three places
*Judg.*11.21. of Scriptures touching this point, seeming repugnant or disagreeing: the first is in this *Act.*13.20. dispute between Jephta and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second 1 *King.*6.1. is that of S. Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Jephta here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeers: S. Paul giveth to the Judges, as it seems, from the end of Josua to the last of Heli, 450. yeers. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Solomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeers. To the first, Beroaldus findeth Jephta's 300. yeers to be but 266. yeers, to wit, 18. of Josua, 40. of Othoniel, 80. of Aod and Samgar, 40. of Debora, Id facit, numero certo pro incerto, proposito. 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Jair: But Jephta (saith Beroaldus) putteth or proposeth a certain number for an uncertain: Sic ut dicat annum agi prope trecentesimum, ex quo nullus litem ea de re moverit Israeli; So he speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about, or well-nigh, the three hundred yeer, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary finds more yeers than Jephta named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israels captivity, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Jephta forbare to repeat the whole sum, or any great part, lest the Ammonites should have justly objected, that 71. of those yeers the Israelites were in captivity, and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeers, it was enough for prescription, he omitted the rest.

To justifie this account of 365. yeers, besides the 71. yeers of captivity or affliction, to be added to Beroaldus his 266. he addeth also 28. yeers more, and so maketh up the summe of 365. These 28. yeers he findeth out thus: twenty yeers he gives to the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel: and where Beroaldus alloweth eighteen yeers to Josua his government, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Josephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius give him 27. Melanthon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. yeers, is far more doubtfull than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeers of affliction (to wit. 34. yeers of the 71.) if we adde them to the 266. yeers of of Beroaldus, which reckoneth none of theſe, we have the juſt number of 300. yeers. Neither is it ſtrange that Jephta ſhould leave out more than halfe of the yeers of affliction: ſeeing, as it is already ſaid, the Ammonites might except againſt the 72. yeers, and ſay, that during theſe yeers, or at leaſt a good part of them, the Iſraelites had no quiet poſſeſſion of the Countries in queſtion. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making theſe 300. yeers remembred by Jephta, to bee 306. which odde yeers, ſaith he, Jephta omitteth. But, becauſe the yeers of every Judge, as they reigned, cannot make up the number of 306. but doe onely compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number the whole time which Moſes ſpent in the Deſarts of Arabia Petræa: which forty yeers of Moſes added to the number which Beroaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I ſee nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers judgment herein: for in the diſpute between Jephta and Ammon for the Land of Gilead, it is written in the perſon of Ammon, in theſe words: Becauſe Iſrael took my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Jaboc, &c. now therefore reſtore thoſe Lands quietly: or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moſes departure out of Egypt, but from the time that the Land was poſſeſt. For it is ſaid, Quia cepit Iſrael terram meam, Becauſe Iſrael took my Land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Jephta's anſwer alſo confirmeth in theſe words: When Iſrael dwelt in Heſhbon, and in her Towns, and in Aroer, and in her Towns, and in all the Cities that are by the coaſt of Arnon 300. yeers: why did ye not then recover them in that time? ſo as this place ſpeaks it directly, that Iſrael had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300 yeers: and therfore to account the times from the hopes or intents that Iſrael had to poſſeſſe it, it ſeemeth ſomewhat ſtrained to meet: for we doe not uſe to reckon the time of our conqueſts in France, from our Princes intents or purpoſes, but from their victories and poſſeſſions. Judg. 11. 28.

Junius nevertheleſſe likes the opinion of Luther, and ſayes, that this time of 300. yeers hath reference, and is to take beginning from the firſt of Jephta's narration: when he makes a brief repitition of Moſes whole journey: to wit, at the ſixteenth Verſe of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our tranſlation in theſe words: But when Iſrael came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moſes his 40. yeers (as he thinkes) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeers: and not onely the time in which Iſrael poſſeſt Gilead, according to the Text, and Jephta's own words: of which I leave the judgment to others: to whom alſo I leave to judge, whether we may not begin the 480. yeers, from the deliverance out of Egypt to the Temple, even from the firſt departure out of Egypt, and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Jephta's account with this reckoning, than any of thoſe that as yet have been ſignified. For firſt, touching Jephta's three hundred yeers of poſſeſſion of the Eaſt ſide of Jordan, it is to be remembred, that for a good while before the Iſraelites poſſeſſed it, Sehon and Og had diſpoſſeſſed Moab and Ammon thereof: ſo that when the Iſraelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of poſſeſſion which they had, paſſed to Iſrael; and ſo Jephta might ſay, that they had poſſeſſed thoſe Countries 300. yeers, reckoning 266. yeers of their own poſſeſſion, and the reſt of the poſſeſſion of the two Kings, Sehon and Og, whoſe right the Iſraelites had by the law of conqueſt. Junius in the 11. of Judg. annot.

The ſecond place diſputed is this of S. Paul, Act. 13. that from the end of Joſua, to the beginning of Samuel, there paſt 450. yeers. And this place Luther underſtandeth alſo beſides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Funccius Krentzheimius, and Beza) for I have not reade his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moſes, to the laſt yeer of Heli, but 357. yeers: and this he doth the better to approve the times from the egreſſion out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the firſt of Kings 6. is ſaid to be 480. yeers. Reade the 24. of Joſ. and the 2. of Judg. 7. Funcc. Chro. f. 4. Beza in his annotations upon the 13. of Act. v. 10.

Now forasmuch as S. Paul (as it ſeems) findes 450. yeers from the death of Joſua, to the laſt of Heli, and leaves but thirty yeers for Saul and Samuel, who governed 40. for David who ruled 40. and for Solomon who wore the Crown three whole yeers ere that the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450. yeers, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words [then afterward] being clearly referred to the death, or after the death Act. 13. 20.

of Josua, as shall be hereafter proved. But where Saint Luke, rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeers (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinity of those two Greek words, whereof the one signifieth 300. and the other 400. wrote Tetracosioon, for Triacosioon; 400. yeers for 300 yeers; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments: to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary judgment to this hath Codoman: whereas Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Josua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeers: to wit, of the Judges (the reckoning Sampsons yeers) 319. and of yeers of servitude and affliction under foreigners, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeers, is, because he thinks that they were part of the 40. yeers, in which the Philistims are said to have oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time, they were Lords over Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. yeers of servitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I have said) 319. yeers, which two sums put together, make 430. yeers. And whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeers, he finds 20. yeers to make up Saint Pauls number, to have been spent after the death of Josua by the Seniors, before the Captivity of Cusban, or the election of Othoniel: which 20. yeers added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approve this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of scriptures, namely the 24. of Josua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the dayes of Josua, and all the dayes of the Elders that over-lived Josua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giveth 20. yeers, which make as before 450. according to Saint Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if here also the 20. yeers of the Seniors between Josua and Othoniel should be denied. For they which deny these yeers, and make Othoniel 40. to begin presently upon the death of Josua, as in the beginning of this reckoning they have 20. yeers lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeers of affliction apart from the yeers of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons yeers, and of the forty yeers of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they have 20 yeers more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeers of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to be the one half of the forty of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeers of the Seniors be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seems to inforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson judged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeers, besides the 20 while Sampson was their Judge; and so the reckoning will come to 450. yeers between the end of Josua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the seniors between Josua and Othoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeers, to which if we adde the yeers of the Judges, which are 339. we have the just sum of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seem to be much more probable, than their that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, and read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceive that this time of 350. yeers is to begin immediately, or soon after the death of Moses: certainly the place of Saint Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be received for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of forty yeers, God suffered their manners in the wildernesse: and he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and devided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gave unto them Judges about 450 yeers, unto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses, and of his yeers spent in the Wildernesse, then in the ninteenth verse he cometh unto the acts of Josua; which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and divided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth Verse it followeth, Then afterward he gave them Judges about 450, yeers, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of Saint Pauls meaning, so far as my weak understanding can pierce it. The onely inconvenience of any weight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seems irreconcileable with the account, 1 Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. yeers between the end of Josua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeers between the beginning of the Israelites journeying from Egypt, and the foundation of the Temple by Solomon. To this difficulty

Judg. 13.

Judg. 15. 11.

Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeers, 1 Reg. 6. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their journying from Egypt, which he makes to be 39. yeers after the beginning of Othoniels government; from whence if we cast the yeers of the Judges, with the yeers of servitude (which sums, according to his account, of which we have already spoken, make 397. yeers) and so to these yeers adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of David, and the 3. of Solomon, we shall have the just sum of 480. yeers. Neither is it hard, saith he) that the annus egressionis, 1 Kings 6. 1. should be understood egressionis non incipientis, sed finitæ, the yeer of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeer after they came out of Egypt, may well be understood for the yeer after they were come out thence, that is, after they had ended their wandring from thence. For so we finde that things which were done forty yeers after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to have been done in their going out of Egypt; as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Jordan was driven back. And Deut. 1. 1. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus far it seems we may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiissent, or ab exitu finito: for if Junius, Deut. 4. 45. do well reade quum exiissent, for in exitu, as it seems that herein he doth well, why may not we also, to avoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exiissent?

The next point to be cleered, is how their journeying should be said not to have had end untill the 25. yeer after the victory of Othoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end, till when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not untill this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as is declared, Judg. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the Expedition may most conuenently be referred. And thus without any great inconvenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Jephta, and of Saint Paul, with that in the first Kings, cap. 6. Judg. 18. 1.

Now whereas it is said, that the Expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that we should suppose that Othoniel lived all those 40. yeers of rest, of which Judg. 3. 11. so that by the 25. yeer after his victory, either he might have been dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might have refused all Soveraignty, and so either way it might truely be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeer after Othoniels victory) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers, grounding their opinions on the plain Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it self sound enough and coherent, might perhaps be received as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul have not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they sound, and are set down. But being that he wanteth all help of authority, we may justly suspect the supposition whereupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authours would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeer of Othoniel? Or what other probability hath he than his own conjecture, to shew that Othoniel did forenounce the office of a Judge after five and twenty yeers, that it might thus be truely said there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was good in his own eyes?

Now concerning the rehearsall of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to have been, when Israel came out of Egypt: as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when he came out of the Holy Land, for so all journies with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I think that he can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as fitteth a journie by an accident, or saith by converting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most unproper it were to give date unto actions commenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely, to say, that King Edward at his arrivall out of Palestina did win Scotland, or died at Carlile. How may we then beleeve that enterprize performed so many yeers after the division of the Land (which followed the conquest at the journies end) should be said to have been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, serving as the onely guide for certain ages in sacred Chronologie, should not take name and beginning ginning from that illustrious deliverance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himself among the principall of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeer and moneth wherein it expired) and the form of the yeer upon that occasion changed; but should have reference to the surprizing of a Town by six hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to work in Gods Name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeer, because it best stood with his interpretation so to have it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it self.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirm, that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set down the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, delivered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Judges and Prophets unto the time of Saul, did raise up our Lord Jesus Christ out of the seed of David the King, in whose succession the Crown was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should have no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus much which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein he sheweth Christ to have been the true Messias) the Apostle was so far from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well known and beleeved of the Jews to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large of the 40. yeers consumed in the Wilderneſſe, whereof no man doubted, saying that God suffered their manners in the Wilderneſſe about 40. yeers. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the division of the Land unto the dayes of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to have a King, there passed about 450. yeers. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eleven yeers of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeers of the Judges: for this had been an impertinent digression from the argument which he had in hand. Wherefore it is not a work so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the sum of 480. yeers is so expresly and purposely set down.

Now that the words of S. Paul (if there be no fault in the copy through error of some Scribe) are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken as having reference to the memory and apprehension of the vulgar, it is evident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeers to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeers were divided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that far the greater part of them were spent under the government of the Prophet, howsoever they are here included in the reign of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the general opinion, when it favoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to help where the need is not over-great; I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently justified by Beroaldus, as having reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeers of servitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeers ascribed to the Judges; which account the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speak as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentis & quinquaginta annis; As it were four hundred and fifty yeers. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs have it be so indeed, and therefore disjoyneth the members to make the account even. In so doing he dasheth himself against a notable Text, whereupon all Authours have builded, (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast up the yeers from the departure out of Egypt, unto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very moneth it self.

1 Kings 6.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) having already given himself to his own interpretation of S. Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to finde some new exposition for that which is of it self most plain, & to examine his own conjectures upon a place that is full of controversie. Thus by expounding after a strange Method, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himself in those wayes wherein before him never man walked. Surely if one should urge him to give reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, that Othoniel could not govern above 25. yeers, because then was the taking of Laish; at which time there was no King in Israel; That the

Danites

Danites must needs have taken Laish at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might be termed the comming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the years of servitude; And that the years of servitude must needs be included, for that otherwise hee himself should have spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an expolition. Whether this ground be strong enough to uphold a Paradox, I leave it to the decision of the judicious Reader.

And now to proceed in our story. To the time of Jephta are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the provisions which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycena, made for her recovery. Others referre this rape of Helen to the fourth year of Ibzan: from which time, if the warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had six years to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, Longa praparatio belli celerem affert victoriam, That a long preparation begets a speedy victorie: for the Greeks consumed ten years in the attempt; and Troy, as it seems, was entred, sackt, and burnt in the third year of Habdon.

Three years after Troy taken, which was in the six year of Habdon, Æneas arrived in Italy. Habdon in the eighth year of his rule, died, after hee had been the Father of 40. sons, and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. years of Israels oppression by the Philistims (of which Judg. 13. v. 1.) took beginning from the birth year of Zair, and ended with the last of Habdon: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Jephta, for not calling them to war over Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in servitude in their own territories; and if Ephraim could have brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they were then oppresst: and had it been true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather have fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Army for their own deliverance, than against their own brethren the Israelites? but Ammon being overthrown, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enemy. And therefore these 40. years must either be supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Sampson, and afterward: or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum between the death of Habdon, and the deliverance of Israel by Sampson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets, how they have observed historicall truth.

THe Warre at Troy, with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom in the last place I have mentioned) I rather choose here to treat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineal descent of their Princes, than to break the story into peeces by rehearsing a-part in divers years, the diversity of occurrents.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is uncertain, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Teucer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if he (as Reineccius thinks) took from Berosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it rests upon the authoritie of Virgil, who saith thus:

Mons Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostræ.

Centum Urbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde Pater (si rite audita recordor)
Teucrus Rhœteas primum est advectus ad oras:
Optavitq; locum regno. Nondum Ilium & arces
Pergamea steterant; habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantiaq; æra, Idæumq; nemus.

In the main Sea the Ile of Creete doth lye:
Where Jove was born, thence is our progeny.
There is a mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Teucer the eldest of our grand-sires came
To the Rhætean shores: and reigned there,
Ere yet fair Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they sought In lowest Vales. Hence Cybels rites were brought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remove;
And hence the name of our Idæan grove.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Teucer first gave name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same book he speaks thus:

Est locus, Hesperiam Graii cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiquâ, potens armis atq; ubere gleba,
Oenotrii coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propria sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus:
Fasiusq; Pater, genus à quo principe nostrum.

Hesperia the Grecians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
Oenotrians held it: now the later progenie
Gives it their Captains name, and calls it Italy;
This seat belongs to us; hence Dardanus,
Hence came the author of your stock, Fasius.

Atq; equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis)
Auruncos ita fere senes, hic ortus ut agris
Dardanus Idæus Phrygiæ penetravit ad urbes, Threiciamq; Samum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhena ab sede profectum,
Aurea nunc solio stellantis regia cœli
Accipit, &c.

Some old Aruncans, I remember well,
(Though time have made the fame obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how born in Italy,
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leaving Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did sail to Samothrace;
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starry skie.

But contrary to this, and so many Authors, approving and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucri, and Thraces, are derived from Tiras or Thiras the son of Japhet: and that the Dardanians, Mysians, & Ascanians, mixt with the Trojans, were were Germane Nations, descended from Ashkenaz, the son of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and river of Ascanius in Asia took name. That Ashkenaz gave name to those places and people, it is not unlikely: neither is it unlikely, that the Ascanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times pass into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tyras, the conjecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassæus makes him an Athenian, I find none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Creta, whose authority is the more to be regarded, because he had good means to find the truth, which it is probable that he carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles he did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that think him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Son of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Country, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece Batia was the second wife of Dardanus founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gave his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise; and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the son of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Fasius. Annius out of his Berosus finds the name of Camboblascon, to whom he gives the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignity, making him Father of Dardanus and Fasius; and further telling us very particularly of the faction between these Brethren, which grew to such heat, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the history gives leave to Annius of saying what he list. I, that love not to use such libertie, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Son of Jupiter, it must have been of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that lived about the War of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost every name of gods: but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the acts of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus gives, because others giving him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Concerning the beginning and continuance of the Trojan Kingdome, with the length of every Kings reign, I have chosen good Authors to be my guides, that in a Historie, whereon depends the most ancient computation of times among the Greeks, I might not follow incertainties, ill cohering with the consent of Writers, and generall passage of things elsewhere done. And first for the destruction of Troy, which was of greater note than any accident befalling that City whilest it stood, it is reckoned by Diodorus to be 780. years more ancient than the beginning of the ninty fourth Olympiad. Whereas therefore 372. did passe between the beginning of the Olympiads, and the first year of the 94. it is manifest that the remainder of 780. years, that is, 408. years went between the destruction of Troy, and the first institution of those games by Iphitus, if the authority of Diodorus be good proof, who elsewhere tels us, that the return of the Heraclidæ, which was 80. years after the fall of Troy, was 328. years before the first Olympiad. Diod. l. 14. Diod. in præf.

Hereunto agrees the authority of Dionysius Halicarnassæus, who placing the foundation of Rome in the first of the seventh Olympiad, that is, four and twenty years after the beginning of those games, accounts it 432. later than the fall of Troy. Solinus in expresse words, makes the institution of the Olympiads by Iphitus, whom he calleth Iphiclus, 480. years later than the destruction of Troy. The sum is easily collected by necessary inference out of divers other places in the same book. Hereunto doth Eusebius, reckoning exclusively agree: and Eratosthenes (as he is cited by Clemens Alexandrinus) makes up out of many particulars, the same totall sum, wanting, but one year, as reckoning likewise exclusively. Dionys. Halic. Antiq. 2. Solin. Polybist. c. 2. Euseb. de præ. Evang. l. 10. c. 3. Cle. Alex. Strom. lib. 1.

The other collections of divers writers that are cited by Clemens in the same place, do neither cohere any way, nor depend upon any collaterall history, by which they may be verified.

The destruction of Troy being in the year before the Olympiads four hundred and eight: we must seek the continuance of that from the beginning to the end, out of Eusebius, who leads us from Dardanus on-wards, through the reigns of four Kings, by the space of two hundred and five and twenty years, and after of Priamus, with whom also at length it ended. As for the time which passed under Laomedon, we are fain to do as others have done before us, and take it upon trust from Annius his Authors; beleeving Manetho so much the rather, for that in his account of the former Kings reigns, and of Priamus, he is found to agree with Eusebius, which may give us leave to think that Annius hath not herein corrupted him. But in this point we need not to be very scrupulous: for seeing that no history or accompt of time depends upon the reign of the former Kings, but onely upon the ruin of the Citie under Priamus, it may suffice that we are carefull to place that memorable accident in the due year.

True it is, that some objections appearing weighty, may be alleged in maintenance of different computations, which with the answers I purposely omit, as not willing to dispute of those years, wherein the Greeks knew no good forme of a year; but rather to make narration of the actions which were memorable, and acknowledged by all writers, whereof this destruction of Troy was one of the most renowned.

The first enterprise that was undertaken by generall consent of all Greece, was the last war of Troy, which hath bin famous even to this day, for the numbers of Princes and valiant Commanders there assembled; the great battails fought with variable successe; the long indurance of the siege; the destruction of that great Citie; and the many Colonies planted in sundry countries, as well by the remainder of the Trojans, as by the victorious Greeks after their unfortunate return. All which things, with innumerable circumstances of especiall note, have bin delivered unto posterity, by the excellent wits of many writers, especially by the Poems of that great Homer, whose verses have given immortality to the action, which might else perhaps have been buried in oblivion; among other worthy deeds, done both before and since that time. For it is true which Horace saith:

Vixere fortes ante Agamemnona
Multi, sed omnes illachrymabiles
Urgentur, ignotiq; longa
Nocte: carent quia vate sacro.

Many

Many by valour have deserv'd renown
Ere Agamemnon; yet lye all oppresst
Under long night, unwept for, and unknown:
For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilst these writers have with strange fables, or (to speak the best of them) with Allegories far strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble undertakers: they have both drawn into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorn, and filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the History, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seek for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose works are both profit and delight; yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise: but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall find matter in Poems, not unworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great war. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking arms: but how he was hereunto emboldened, it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the War.

Herodotus fetcheth the cause of this rape from very far; saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had ravished Iō, and carried her into Egypt, the Greeks, to be revenged on the Barbarians, did first ravish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medæa, whom they fetcht from Colchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Iō. By these deeds of the Greeks, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirms) was emboldened to doe the like; not fearing such revenge as ensued. But all this narration seems frivolous. For what had the King of Colchos to doe with the injury of the Phœnicians? Or how could the Greeks, as in revenge of Iō, plead any quarrell against him, that never had heard the name of Phœnicians? Thucydides, a writer of unquestionable sincerity, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not used at all in Homers time, which was long after the war of Troy: and that the Greeks themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were unreasonable to think, that they should have sought revenge upon all Nations, as barbarous, for the injury received by one: or that all people else should have esteemed of the Greeks, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that even then when as the Greeks had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probability say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redelivery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and given to Telamon. This may have been true: for Telamon (as it seems) was a cruell man, seeing his own son Teucer durst not come in his sight, after the war of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Ajax (which Teucer could not remedy) had slain himself. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill entreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely that Priamus her brother would seek to take her from her husband, with whom she had lived about thirty years, and to whom shee had borne children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I think that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medæa, or Hesione, but was meerly incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discourseth; but all people were accustomed to steal women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them: and having stollen them either to sell them away in some farre Countrie, or keep them to their own use. So did Theseus and Pirythous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) ravish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neer unto the Sea, for fear of pyracy, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull than merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus, the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in in Greece, to binde themselves by solemn oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might help to recover her. This done, he gave free choice of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greeks unto Troy in revenge of Helens rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made unto her Father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping: for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: he was also rich in mony, and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom he embarked for Troy in his own ships, which were more than any other of the Greek Princes brought to that expedition. Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon, and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise, take arms against the Trojans. The Greeks Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayl, or thereabouts: but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with decks; onely they used (as Thucydides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fifty men, the greatest 120. every man (except the Captains) being both a Mariner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appears that the Grecian army consisted of 100000. men or thereabout. This was the greatest army that ever was raised out of Greece: and the greatnesse of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which ten whole years did stand out against such forces: yet were the Trojans which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads; but their followers and aides were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Missia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, took part with the Trojans. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some think out of Æthiopia) came to their defence.

§ III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helena's being detained in Egypt, and of the sacrificing of Iphigenia.

WHerefore the Greeks, unwilling to come to tryall of arms, if things might be compounded by treaty, sent Menelaus and Ulysses Embassadours to Troy; who demanded Helen, and the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Trojans made hereunto it is uncertain. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his return to Troy. The sum of his discourse is this.

Paris in his return with Helena, being driven by foul weather unto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuarie. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her, till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greeks demanding Helen, had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the City taken, they perceived indeed shee had not been there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to ask his wife of Proteus. Homer, and the whole Nation of Poets (except Euripides) vary from this History, thinking it a matter more magnificent, and more gracefull to their Poems, for the retaining of a fair Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to deliver her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysses, Homer speaks of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily believed that hee made for pleasure: and if hee were driven thither by contrary Winds, much more may wee think that Paris was likely to have been driven thither by foul Weather. For Paris immediately upon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such Windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storm, than to commit himself to any Haven in the Greek Seas: whereas Menelaus might have put into any port in Greece, and there have remained with good entertainment, untill such time as the Wind had come about, and served for his Navigation.

One

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirm the saying of the Egyptian Priests; which is, that if Helen had been at Troy, it had been utter madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slain for the pleasure of one, who neither was heir to the Kingdome (for Hector was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seem that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the warre of Troy, was almost as old as Queen Hecuba, considering that she had been ravished by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to have been twinnes) who sailed with the Argonauts, having Telamon the father of Ajax in their company, before the time that Hesione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principall Commander in the Trojan warre. But whether it were so that the Trojans could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Ambassadours returned ill contented, and not very well entreated, for there wanted not some that advised to have them slain. The Greeks hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy: at which time Calchas (whom some say to have been a Runnagate Trojan, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captains, and all the Hoast with many troublesome answers and divinations. For he would have Agamemnons daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddesse was contented with a Hinde, it is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the Devill, which awaits for all opportunities, is never more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greeks, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatall impediments were removed: and that till ten years were past, the Town should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greeks proceeded in their enterprise, under the command of Agamemon, who was accompanied with his Brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greeks, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phœnix; Ajax and Teucer, the sonnes of Telamon; Idomeneus and his companion Meriones; Nestor and his sons Antilochus and Thrasymides; Ulysses, Menestheus the son of Petreus, Captain of the Athenians; Diomedes the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wise and learned Palamedes, Ascalaphus, and Talmenus, the sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonauts; Philoctetes also the son of Paan, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the Citie could not be taken; Ajax the son of Oileus, Peneleus, Thoas, Eumelus, Tyssandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the son of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Machon, the sons of Æsculapius; Epeus, who is said to have made the wooden Horse, by which the town was taken; and Protesilaus, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of the Græcians at the siege.

THese, and many other of lesse note, arriving at Troy, found such sharp entertainment, as might easily perswade them to think that the warre would bee more than one years work. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilaus, whom Hector slew, and many other, without any great harm done to the Trojans: save only that by their numbers of men, they wan ground enough to incamp themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greeks found, was want of victuals, which grew upon them by reason of their multitude, and the the smalnesse of their vessels wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an Army. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the ground in Cherronesse: others to rob upon the Sea for the relief of the Camp. Thus was the warre protracted nine whole years, and either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the town receive little losse by them, having equall numbers to maintain the field against such Greeks as continued the siege, and a more safe retrait if the enemie got the better.

Wherefore Ovid saith, That from the first year, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all, and Heraclide commends as very credible, the report of Herodicus, that the Greeks did not lye before Troy the first nine years: but onely did bear up and down the Seas, exerci-exercising their men, and inriching themselves, and so by wasting the enemies countrie, did block up the Town, unto which they returned not, untill the fatall time drew neer when it should be subverted.

This is confirmed by the enquirie which Priamus made, when the Greek Princes came into the field, the tenth year, for he knew none of them, and therefore sitting upon an high tower (as Homer tells) he learned their names of Helen: which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all have been supposed that he should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the town so many years together. Between these relations of Thucidides and Herodotus, the difference is not much; the one saying, that a few of the Greeks remained in the Camp before Troy, while the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the others that the whole armie did spend the time in wasting the Sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many towns and Ilands wasted, and the people carried into Captivitie, in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would have spared, if any service of importance had been to be performed before the Citie. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Camp, and a great pestilence arose among the Greeks: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in revenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ransome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sunne, who raised pestilent Fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well be that the camp was over-pestered with those, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

Hom. Illead. 3.

About the same time arose much contention between Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, having first chosen for his part a captive woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himself another, then Ajax, Ulysses, and so the rest of the chiefe Captains in order: when the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemnons woman should be restored to her father Apollo's Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoile, but would either take that which had been given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Ulysses. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was fain to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to revenge her losse otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captains. But the Greeks, encouraged by their Captains, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troops.

The Trojans were now relieved with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having sent them aide: partly drawn to that warre by their Commanders who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith he abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer), or for love of himselfe and his sons, or hope of marriage with some of his many and fair daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greeks when they wasted the Countries adjoyning unto Troy. So that when Hector issued out of the town, he was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captains in the Trojan armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sons of Priamus: Æneas, Antenor, and his sons, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the sons of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slain the first night of his arrivall; Memnon, Queen Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the war. Between these and the Greeks were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus upon the Plain: and another at the very trenches of the Camp, wherein Hector brake through the fortifications of the Greeks, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the son of Telamon, with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining unwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greeks was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles troops, relieving the wearie Greeks with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomades, Ulysses, and the rest of the Princes though sore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Trojans very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was loſt, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought back into the Camp: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torn from him by Hector. It was the manner of thoſe wars, having ſlain a man, to ſtrip him, and hale away his body, not reſtoring it without ranſome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, ſlightly armed, and commonly followed the ſucceſs of their Captains; who rode not upon horſes, but in Chariots, drawn by two or three horſes, which were guided by ſome truſty followers of theirs, which drave up and down the field, as they were directed by the Captains, who by the ſwiftneſſe of their horſes preſenting themſelves where need required, threw firſt their Javelins, and then alighting, fought on foot, with ſwords and battle-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or els returning to their Chariots when they found cauſe, and ſo began again with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were loſt or broken. Their armes defenſive were helmets, breſt-plates, boots of braſſe, or other mettall, and ſhields commonly of leather plated over. The offenſive were ſwords and battel-axes at hand, and ſtones, arrows or darts when they fought at any diſtance. The uſe of their Chariots (beſides the ſwiftneſſe) was to keep them from wearineſſe, whereto the leaders were much ſubject, becauſe of their armour, which the ſtrongeſt and ſtouteſt ware heavieſt, alſo that from them they might throw their Javelins downwards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driven to return to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewiſe of armours they had little change or none; every man (ſpeaking of the chiefe) carried his own compleat, of which if any piece were loſt or broken, he was driven to repair it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from ſome Captain whom he had ſlain, and ſtripped: or elſe to borrow of them that had by ſuch means gotten ſome to ſpare. Wherefore Achilles had loſt his armour which Hector (as is ſaid before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was fain to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very deſirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his dear friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himſelfe unto Achilles, not onely reſtoring his concubine Briſeis, but giving him very great gifts, and excuſing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did ſo behave himſelf, that he did not onely put the Trojans to the worſt, but alſo ſlew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleeved) he chaced three times about the walls of Troy. But great queſtion may be made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would ſtay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leap over the rivers of Xanthus and Simois, as he muſt have done in that flight: nor that the Trojans, perceiving Hector in ſuch an extremitie, would have forborn to open ſome of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who having (by what means ſoever) ſlain the noble Hector, did not onely carry away his dead body, as the cuſtome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thruſting leathern thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him ſhamefully about the field, ſelling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranſome. But his cruelty and covetouſneſs were not long unrevenged; for he was ſhortly after ſlain with an arrow by Paris, as Homer ſayes, in the Scæan Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too far in love, having ſlain ſo many of her brethren; and his body was ranſomed (as Lycophron ſaith) at the ſelf-ſame rate that Hectors was by him ſold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queen of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after ſome proofe given of her valour, was ſlain by Pyrrhus the ſon of Achilles.

(which followed the Poets) have delivered, it is uncertain. Some write that upon one of the gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gave occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificial horse. It may well be that with some wooden engine, which they called a horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romans in after-times used to do with the Ramme: or scaled the walls upon the sudden, and so took the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden horse, it had been a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpose. For either the Trojans might have perceived the deceit, and slain all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintain this report they are said to have thought upon:) or they might have left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was unlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude upon the bringing it into the town, and break down their walls upon the sudden to doe it:) by which means they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by issuing forth unseasonably discovered the invention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not be brought into the town through any of the gates, and that therefore the Trojans were fain to pull down a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greeks did afterwards enter; it is hereby manifest, that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that without their help there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

John Baptista Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greeks did both batter the walls with a wooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the townsmen sleeping and drinking without fear or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trojans into security. That the Citie was betrayed, the books of Dares and Dyctis must prove, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they did, have followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that war made against the common report, had it not been that either those books were even in those times thought frivolous, or else contained no such repugnantie to the other Authours as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slain in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to have been above 600000. on the Trojan side, and more than 800000. of the Greeks, it is a report meerly fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greeks was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deeds as much as he could, to be somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported over the Greek seas, not much above 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deeds of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captains of the Greeks that served in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Trojans and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea, the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnestheus the son of Peteus had shewed in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had been a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld unto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiralty of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which have striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes that warred at Troy: all difficulties or unlikelihoods in such their Pedegree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probabilitie, came of the Trojans, were the Albanes in Italie; and from them the Romans, brought into that Country by Æneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adjoyning, by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the son of King Priamus. To which Hellanicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did assemble such of the Trojans as were left, and reigned over them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greeks returning from Troy.

CConcerning the Greeks, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought upon the Trojans. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient seats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slain anon after their arrivall: others were debarred from the Soveraignty among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seem to have been the dispersion of the Armie, which, weakned much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell injuries, being divided into so many pieces under severall Commanders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the boorie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set sail, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and perform some sacrifices to Minerva. Hereupon they fell to hot words, half the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos, where when they arrived, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned back to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his own course. But the whole fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who nevertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soon after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slain by his wife, and by the Adulterer Ægystus, who for a while after usurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long upon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seem) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten years, having lost all his company, got home in poor estate, with much ado recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and fain to seek out new habitations.

Ajax the son of Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Daunus, who was Lord of the Japiges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africk, others into Italy, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many towns which the Greeks were driven to erect upon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Grecian Ladies, whose husbands had been at the war of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greeks suffered miserie, and the unlucky Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the overthrow of which City, as hath been said, happened in the time of Habdon Judge of Israel, whom Sampson, after a vacancie or Inter-regnum for certain years, succeeded.

CHAP. XV.

Of Sampson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Sampson.

2970. THE birth and acts of Sampson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie, First, that the Angel of God forbad the wife of Manoah the mother of Sampson, to drink Wine or strong drink, or to eat any unclean meat after shee was conceived with child; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrink the child in the mothers wombe. Though this were even the counsell of God himself, and delivered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age have not read, or

or at least will not believe this precept: the most part forbearing not drinks, nor meats, how strong or unclean soever, filling themselves with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinks far more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodies are born into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refused the sacrifice which Manoah would have offered him, commanding him to present it unto the Lord: and therefore those that professe divination by the help of Angels, to whom also they sacrifise, may assuredly know that they are devils who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receive no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Sampson was twice betrayed by his wives, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull tears: by the first he lost but a part of his goods, by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas evertit: Whom no force could over-master, Voluptuousnesse overturned.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliver Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he revenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slain 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corn in harvest time, and given them a great overthrow instantly upon it; yet so much did Israel fear the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Juda, to besiege Sampson, in the rock or mountain of Etam, using these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are rulers over us? &c. After which they bound him, and delivered him unto the Philistims, for fear of their revenge; though he was no sooner loosened, but he gave them another overthrow, and slew 1000. with the jaw-bone of an Asse.

Lastly, being made blind, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his own life, to be avenged of his enemies, when he pulled down the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Sampson, to deride him; till which time he bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca; Patientia sæpe læsa vertitur in furorem; Patience often wounded is converted into furie; neither is it at any time so much wounded by pain and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

§. II.

Of Eli, and of the Ark taken; and of Dagons fall, and the sending back of the Ark.

THe Storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Sampson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sons, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whose sins were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaning and polluting the holy places: though Levis Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites under the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sons of Eli being slain, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chair, brake his neck. He was the first that obtained the High-Priesthood of the stock of Ithamar the son of Aaron, before whose time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the son of Eleazar the third, Abisue the son of Phinees the fourth, his son Bucci the fift, Ozi the son of Bucci the sixt, and then Eli, as Josephus and Lyranus out of divers Hebrew Authors have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli, to the time of Salomon, who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their successours. The Ark of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that he forsook the habitation of Shila: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his power into captivitie, &c.

Psal. 78.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Ark whereby himself was represented should fall in the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people; so did he permit the Chaldæans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon, the Romans to overthrow the second Temple, and the Turks to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the ſacrament or repreſentation, which was the Ark, that in God himſelf, they would have obſerved his Lawes, and ſerved him onely: which whenſoever they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivitie they had no Ark at all, nor in the times of the Machabees: and yet for their pietie it pleaſed God to make that famille as victorious as any that guarded themſelves by the ſigne inſtead of the ſubſtance. And that the Ark was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an enſigne, David witneſſed when he fled from Abſalon. For when the Priests would have carried the Ark with him, he forbad it, and cauſed it to be carried into the Citie, uſing theſe words: If I ſhall find favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me again: if not, let him doe to me as ſeemeth good in his eyes. 1 Sam. 5. 6. 2 Sam. 15.

The Troians believed that while their Palladium or the image of Minerva was kept in Troy, the Citie ſhould never be overturned: ſo did the Chriſtians in the laſt Croiſade believe againſt whome carry into the field, as they were made believe, the very Croſſe whereon Chriſt died; and yet they loſt the battell, their bodies, and the wood. But Chriſoſtome upon Saint Matthew (if that be his work) giveth a good judgement touching of thoſe that were a part of Saint Johns Goſpell about their necks, for an amulet or preſervative: Si libri non proſunt in auribus, quomodo proderunt in collo? If the words did not profit when in their eares, (to wit, the hearing of the Goſpell preached) how ſhould it profit when by hanging it about their necks? For it was neither the wood of the Ark, nor the wood of the Croſſe, but the reverence of the Father that gave the one for a memorial of his Covenant, and the Faith in his Sonne, which ſhed his bloud on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and us, either in this life or after it.

The Philiſtims returning with the greateſt victorie and glorie which ever they obtained, carried the Ark of God with them to Azotus, and ſet it up in the houſe of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from above to the ground, and lay under the Ark. The morning following they took it up, and ſet it again in his place. And it fell the ſecond time, and the head brake from the body, and the hands from the armes, ſhewing, that it had not power nor underſtanding in the preſence of God; for the head fell off, which is the ſeat of reaſon and knowledge, and the hands (by which we execute ſtrength) were ſundred from the armes. For God and the devill inhabit not in one houſe, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not endure the repreſentation of the true God, it is not to be marvelled, that at ſuch time as it pleaſed him to cover his onely begotten with fleſh, and ſend him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Devill derided and betrayed mortall men, loſt power, ſpeech and operation at the inſtant. For when that true light which never had beginning of brightneſſe, brake through the clouds of a Virgins body, ſhining upon the earth which had been long obſcured by Idolatrie, all thoſe foul and ſtinking vapours vaniſhed. Plutarch rehearſeth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as he tolde him; whereof (as ignorant of the true cauſe) he ſeaketh his braines of many reaſons of ſo great an alteration: yet findeth none out but frivolous. For not only this old Devill Pan then died as he ſuppoſed, but all the reſt, as Apollo, Jupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became (even then) ſenſleſſe. Sam. 5. 12.

Now while the Philiſtims triumphed after this victorie, God ſtrook them with the grievous diſeaſe of the Hæmerhoids, of which they periſhed in great numbers. For it is written, that the Lord ſtrook them. It was therefore by generall conſent ordered, that the Ark ſhould be removed from Azotus to Gath or Geth, another of the five great Cities of the Philiſtims, to prove, if it were ſo, whether this diſeaſe were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediately: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grievous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was againſt this Citie with a very great deſtruction, and he ſmote the men of the Citie both ſmall and great, &c. And being not yet ſatisfied, they of Gath ſent the Ark to Ekron, another of the Cities of the Philiſtims: but they alſo felt the ſame ſmart, and cryed out, that themſelves and their people ſhould be ſlain thereby; for there was a deſtruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by the advice of their Priests the Princes of the Philiſtims did not onely reſolve to return the Ark, but to offer gifts unto the God of Iſrael, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Egyptians, when their hearts were hardned to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his ſervice by ſtrong hand. Wherefore confeſſing the power of the God of Iſrael to be infinite, and that their own Idols were ſubject thereunto, they agreed to offer a ſin-offering, 1 Sam. 5. 6. 2 Sam. 15. 10 20 30 40 using these words; So ye shall give glorie to the God of Israel, that he may take his hand from you, and from your gods, and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing than where an enemie doth approve our cause? according to Aristotle, Pulchrum est testimonium, quod ab hostibus probamur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the living God, when he was plagued in Egypt: and Nabuchadonosor and Darius, when they had seen his miracles by Daniel.

This counsell therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hæmorrhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to be chosen, such as had not been yoaked, and a new Cart or Carriage to be framed: but they durst not drive or direct it into any place certain, thereby to make tryall whether it were indeed the hand of God that had stricken them. For if the Ark of God were carried towards Bethshemesh and into the territorie of Israel, then they should resolve that from God only came their last destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Ark, could not be forced from their calves, but that they would have followed them whereſoever, much lesse when they were left to themselves, would they travel a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world, if calves be removed from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods and deserts by the foot, till they find them. But the kine travelled directly towards Bethshemesh: and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one Josua of the same City, they stood still there, which when the Princes of the Philistims perceived, they returned to Ekron. After which, God spared not his own people the Bethshemites, in that they presumed to look in the Ark. And because they knew God and his commandements, and had been taught accordingly; he strook them more grievously than he did the heathen: for there perished of them fifty thousand and seventy. From hence the Ark was carried to Kiriath-jearim, and placed in the house of Aminadab, where it is written that it remained twenty years in the charge of Eleazar his son, until David brought it to Hierusalem.

Now whereas it is said, that in the mean while the Ark was in Nob, Maspa, and Galgala, it was the Tabernacle, which was at this time severed from the Ark, or at least, it was for the present occasion brought to these places, and anon returned to Kiriath-jearim.

§. III.

Of Samuel, and of his Government.

THese Tragedies overpast and ended, Samuel, to whom God appeared while he was yet a child, became now Judge and Governour of Israel. He was descended of the familie of [b] Chore or Korach. For Levi had three sons; Gerson, Cheath, and Merari: Cheath had Amram and Izaar; of Amram came Moses and Aaron; of Izaar, Chore; and of the familie of Chore, Samuel. His father Elcana a Levite, was called an Ephrataan; not that the Levites had any proper inheritance, but because hee was of Mount Ephraim, like as Jesse, David's father, was called an Ephrataan, because borne at Ephratah, or Bethlehem. Hannah his mother being long fruitlesse, obtained him of God by prayers and teares: for being an exceeding shame to the Jewish women to be called barren, in respect of the blessing of God both to Abraham, that his seed should multiply as the Starrs of Heaven, and the sands of the Sea; as in the beginning to Adam, Increase and multiply, &c. and in Deuteronomie the seventh; There shall be neither male nor female barren among you.

b 1 Chro. 6. 22.

c Which Region was called Ephrata, as appeareth, Jud. 12. 5. whence for distinction we read Ruth 1. 2. Ephratæi è Bethlechemo Judæ, the town Ephrata, which is Bethlehem Juda, Gen. 35. 19. from the region of Ephrata, which is in Mount Ephraim, whence Psal. 132. 6. Ephrata is put for Silo, which was in the tribe of Ephraim, Ver. 15.

Samuel was no sooner born, but that his mother, according to her former vow, dedicated him to God, and his service; to which he delivered him even from the dugge. For as the first-born of all that were called Nazarites, might be redeemed till they were five years old for five sheekles, and between five years and twenty, for twenty sheekles: so was not required by the Law, that any of the race of the Levites should be called to service about the Tabernacle, till they were five and twenty years old.

Josephus reckons in the Acts of the Prophets from Samuel, who was the first of the writers of holy Scriptures, to whom usually this name of a Prophet was given, & yet did Moses account himselfe such a one; as in the 18. of Deuteronomie, The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto me, &c. But hee is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as before time in Israel, when a man went to seek an answer, 1 Sam. 9.

answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us goe to the Seer; for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appear by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether with-drawn his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldæan Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuel's time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel judged were Maspa or Mitspe, seated on a hill in Benjamin neer Juda: also Gilgal and Bethel, of which we have spoken else-where.

1 Sam. 13. See in this book, c. 12. §. 1.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation of War at Mitspa in the beginning of Samuel's government, gathered their Armie, and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with fear, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and servitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moved with Samuel's prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at the first entrance into Arabia:) it pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beat down the Army of the Philistims, according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords adversaries shall be destroyed, and out of Heaven shall he thunder upon them, &c. Josephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himself led the Israelites in the prosequution of their victory. After which Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy successe, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Josephus called Lapidem fortem: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and advantage of the victorie, the Israelites recovered divers Cities of their own formerly lost, and held long in the possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any invasion or revenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not be assaulted from divers parts at once, having the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gave audience and judgement in divers places by turns, as hath been else-where said.

* Plutarch reports of Numa the second King of Rome, that when as he was sacrificing, it was told him that the enemies approached, he nothing dismaied, answered, Ego autem sacrifico. 1 Sam. 2. 10.

CHAP. XVI.

Of SAUL.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

BUT when age now began to over-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to undergoe the burthen of so carefull a government, he put off from himself the weight of the affairs on his sons, Joel and Abiah, who judged the people at Beersheba, a Citie, the very utmost towards the South of Judæa. And as the place was inconvenient and far away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the justice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of covetousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gain, to recover which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Justice and Judgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel observed, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errours of his own, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might be judged as other Nations were; who might also lead them to the War, and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sons, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yield fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reverenced, but by the choyce of a King.

In

In a cauſe of ſo great conſequence and alteration, Samuel ſought counſell from God: which ſurely hee did not for the eſtablſhing of his own Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not have approved his election. Now as it appears by the Text, this ſpeech or motion diſpleaſing him, he uſed his beſt arguments to dehort them: which when he perceived to be over-feeble, he delivered unto them from Gods revelation, the inconveniences and miſeries which ſhould befall them. And yet, all which he foreſhewed was not intolerable, but ſuch as hath been born, and is ſo ſtill, by free conſent of the ſubjects towards their Princes. For firſt he makes them know that the King will uſe their ſons in his own ſervice to make them his Horſe-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grievous, but by the Vaſſals of all Kings, according to their birth and condition, deſired: it being very agreeable to ſubjects of the beſt qualitie to command for the King in his Warres; and to till the ground no leſſe proper and appertaining to thoſe that are thereto bred and brought up: ſo are likewiſe the offices of women-ſervants to dreſſe meat, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatned, He will take your Fields and your Vineyards, and your beſt Olive trees, and give them to his ſervants; with other oppreſſions: this hath given, and gives daily occaſion to ſuch as would be ruled by their own diſcretion, to affirme that Samuel deſcribeth here unto them the power of a King governed by his own affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others upon further examination conſtrue this Text farre otherwiſe, as teaching us what Subjects ought with patience to bear at their Soveraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded firſt upon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore- Deut. 1.
ſheweth this change of government from Judges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many things unto the Kings, as many wives, covetouſneſſe, and the like, he commandeth that the Kings which were to raign over Iſrael, ſhould write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cauſe it to be written: and to ſhew how greatly the King ſhould honour the Law, he addeth, It ſhall be with him, and he ſhall read therein all the dayes of his life; that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, and to keep all the words of this Law, and theſe ordinances for to doe them: that he may prolong his dayes in his Kingdome, he and his Sons. But to take away any other mans field, ſay they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the ſame book written. For it is ſaid, That which is juſt and right ſhalt thou follow, that thou mayſt Deut. 6. live. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canſt eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much leſſe lawful to take the vineyard Deut. 23. 24.
it ſelf from the owner, and give it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (ſay they) ſuch as do warrant the Kings of Iſrael, or make it proper unto them, to take at will Loyſe.
any thing from their vaſſals. For it is not ſaid that it ſhall be lawfull for the King, or the King may do this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your ſonnes: and again, This ſhall be the manner of the King that ſhall raign over you. God thereby foreſhewing what power, ſevered from pietie (becauſe it is accountable to God onely) will do in the future. And hereof we find the firſt example in Achab, who took from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the truſt which God had put in him, of governing well his people. For God commanded, That his people ſhould be judged with Deut. 16.
righteous judgement. Wherfore, though the King had offered unto Naboth compoſition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which he refuſed: yet becauſe he was falſly accuſed, and unjuſtly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grievouſly Achab was puniſhed by God, the Scriptures tell us. Neither was it a plea ſufficient for Achab againſt the all-righteous God, to ſay that it was done without his conſent, and by the Elders of Iſrael. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a living Law, even as David teſtifieth of himſelf: Poſuiſti me in caput gentium: For this of S. Auguſtine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non eſt innocentia: ſimulata æquitas, non eſt æquitas: ſed duplicatur peccatũ in quo eſt iniquitas & ſimulatio; Feigned innocence, and feined equity, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, in which there is both iniquity & diſſimulation. Such in effect is their diſputation, who think this place to contain the deſcription of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary ſide, as they are many and forcible, ſo are they well known to all; being excellently handled in that Princely diſcourſe of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatiſe I may not preſume to abridge, much leſſe here to inſert. Only thus much I will ſay, That if practice doe ſhew the greatneſſe of authoritie, even the beſt Kings of Juda and Iſrael were not ſo tyed by any lawes, but that they did whatſoever they pleaſed in the greatest things; and commanded some of their own Princes and of their own brethren to be slain without any triall of law, being sometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Uriah, yet Solomon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed to him as any offence.

That the state of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not onely foretold by Moses in Deuteronomie, but perceived by Jacob in this Scripture: The Scepter shall not depart from Juda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing. For it was not onely assured that his issues should in number equall the starres in heaven, but that Kings should proceed of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the pattern of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Universall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other governments, hath been by many judicious men handled and proved, I shall not need to over-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

Gen. 49. Gen. 15. Gen. 17.

In the time of the Judges every man hath observed what civill war Israel had: what outragious slaughters they committed upon each other: in what miserable servitude they lived for many years: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their own territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Jordan, the Philistims the Sea-coasts, and the Jebusites Hierusalem it self, till Davids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subjected all the neighbour Nations and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moved by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to live under a Monarch, or whether by this means they sought to be cleered from the sonns of Samuel, they became deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel used, insisting upon this point, that they would have a King, both to judge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, he sent every man to his own Citie and abiding.

1 Sam. 8.

§. II.

Of the election of Saul.

After that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, he forbare the election of a King, till such time as hee was therein directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would present unto him a man of the Land of Benjamin, whom he commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went unto Ramath Saphim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also having wandred divers dayes to seek his fathers Asses, at length, by the advice of his servant, travelled towards Ramath to find a Seer or prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to find his beasts. In which journey it pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and persons) to elect Saul, who sought an Asse and not a kingdom: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheep of Jethro; and after to make choice of David the youngest of eight sons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts; and changed his sheep-hook into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious King of Juda and Israel. So John and James were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles: a dignitie that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours doe; but permanent and everlasting in Gods everlasting kingdome.

1 Sam. 16.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, hee prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected, and stayed his arrivall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had foretold him of, that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt; Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, above all that were invited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the kingdome, and of Gods graces to be bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israell.

God

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should incounter him by Rahels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the fear of losing his beasts, to doubt the loss of his son: that he should then meet three other men in the plain of Tabor; then a companie of Prophets: and that he should be partaker of Gods Spirit, and prophecie with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and favoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reverenced number, who by divine revelation foretold things to come, reprehended without fear the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Josua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahias, Elias, Eliseus, Esay, Jeremy, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praterita, presentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh 1 Cor. 14. 14. who inriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law. Chrys. in Ps. 43

At Misperh Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his own Uncle therewith, when he asked him what had past between him and Samuel: for either he thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reveale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeth, the generall opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimhi thinks by the answer of * Urim and Thummim: that is, by the answer of the Priest, wearing that mysterie upon his breast when he asked counsell of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not only much used among the Jewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goats, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliverance, for whose garments the Jews also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others, have remembred divers sorts of lots, used by the Romans, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to be undertaken: the two first kinds were called Divisorie; the Third, Divinatorie; and unto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds, howsoever they may seem chancefull, are yet ordered & directed by God: as in the Proverbs: the lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the kingdome of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gave Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himself in modestie, as both Josephus construe it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen king of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that envied his glory (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offring him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to avoyd sedition, took no notice. 1 Sam. 10.

* The Urim and Thummim in the ornaments of the High Priest, were inserted within the pectoral, which therefore was duplicatum: they were placed in the pectorall over against the heart of the High Priest. It is plain that they were not the precious stones, nor any thing made by the artificers. See Exo. 28. 1. Cic. de divin. Paus. in Mes.

§. III.

Of the establishing of Saul by his first victorie.

NO sooner was Saul placed in the kingdome, but that he received knowledge that Nahas King of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Jabes Gilead: which nation since the great overthrow given them by Jephta, never durst attempt any thing upon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwayes attend upon the advantage of time, to recover those Territories which first the Amorite, and then Israel dispossest them of; which they made the ground of their invasion in Jephta's time; yet they never perswaded themselves of more advantage than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembred that the Philistims had not long before slain 34000. of their men of War: and besides had used used great care and policie that they should have no Smiths to make them swords or spears: neither was it long before, that of the Bethshemesites, and places adjoyning, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000 and therefore in these respects, even occasion it self invited them to inlarge their Dominions upon their borderers: Jabes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides, it may further be conjectured, that the Ammonites were

Jud. 12. imboldened against Jabes Gilead, in respect of their weaknesse; since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not joyning with them against the Benjamites: at which time they did not only slaughter the men and male children, but took from them their young women, and gave them to the Benjamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been increased to any great numbers; and if they had recovered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himself with the opinion, that Israel having for long time been disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransome themselves, but by pulling out their right eies, by which they should be utterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value himself in his first years reign, and because perchance he was descended of one of those 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Benjamites, gave order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoak of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers over all the coasts, protesting thus: That whosoever came not forth after Saul, and after Samuel, so should his Oxen be served: threatning the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seven dayes to give Nahas the Ammonite an answer: who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the mean while Saul assembled the forces which repaired unto him at Bezec, near Jordan, that he might readily passe the river; which done, he might in one day with a 1 Sam. 11. 8. speedie march arrive at Jabes, under the Hills of Gilead.

The Armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, he returned an answer to those of Jabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noon. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, & went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the armie of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might set on them on all sides, he divided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword untill the heat of the day, and the wearinesse of Saul troop inforced them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Jabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happy successe, the people were so far in love with their new King, that they would have slain all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolution. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent lovers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth; and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath thrown down.

1 Sam. 11. After the Army removed, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul
1 Sam. 12. was now a third time acknowledged, and, as some Commenters affirm, anointed King: and here Samuel used an exhortation to all the Assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsall of his own Justice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now raigned one year before he was established in Gilgal, or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000 to attend on Jonathan his son at Gibeah, the Citie of his nativitie: the rest he kept about his own person in Miemas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the Warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his finall reiection.

JOnathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some think, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama, when he was first annointed by Samuel, which which they think to have been Cariath-jearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1 Sam. 10. is called the hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-jearim: but Junius understands this Garrison to have been at Gebah in Benjamin neer Gibha, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoever, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly inraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and six thousand Horse; wherewith they invaded Judaea, and incamped at Machmas or Michmas, a Citie of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the middest of the Land between the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden invasion the Israelites were strucken in so great a fear, as some of them hid themselves in the caves of the mountains; others fled over Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himself with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Benjamin, not far from the passage of Joshua when he led Israel over Jordan. Here Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel seven dayes: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place, 1 Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not unto him, and to offer a burnt offering, and a peace offering unto God, contrary to the Ecclesiasticall Lawes of the Hebrews, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obtulit, in this place, by obtulit per Sacerdotem, and so make the sin of Saul not to have been any intrusion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1 Sam. 10. 8. secondly, a diffidence or mistrust in Gods help, and too great relying upon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not bear patiently; and lastly, a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the help which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoever was his sin, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes unfitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant been given to Samuel so to doe, from God himself; at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods own heart) both from Saul and his posteritie.

1 Sam. 13. 5.

1 Sam. 13.

Verse 14.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or spear, but Saul and his son Jonathan onely. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul, came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the year before, or in some part of this very year, to succour Jabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thousand men, if there had not now been any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, save onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his son. But howsoever, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those crafts-men carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left unto the Israelites only files to sharpen and amend such stuffe as served for the Plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kind of armes, it is manifest, or else they durst not have attempted upon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but onely that there was not any found amongst those 600. souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his own guards forsook him, having but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired unto him, of which many were fled from him before Samuel arrived.

1 Sam. 13. 19.

1 Sam. 13. 11.

With this small troop he held himself to his own city of Gibeah, as a place of more strength, & better assured unto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarme the most part of the Israelites, howsoever in the time of Samuel much had been done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or spear, but by thunder from Heaven: and when these crafts-men were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no marvell if they could not in a short peace under Samuel be replanted again. For this tyrannie of the Philistims is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than under Samuel: and yet under him is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policy, not suffering their Artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policy did Nabuchodonosor use after his Conquest in Judæa: Dionysius in Sicily, and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repair in Gilead, for over Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquity used, and their present necessity ministred unto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Benjamites exceeded in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter it is written of those that came to succour David against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could use the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that David himself slew the Gyant Goliah.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims having parted their army into three troops, that they might spoil and destroy many parts at once; Jonathas, strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountain, whereon
1 Sam. 14. 12. a company of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their army (as may be gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plain adjoyning. And though he were discovered before he came to the hill top, and in a kind of derision, called up by his enemies; yet he so behaved himself, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarm, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, fear, and jealousie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrews which became of their party, because they feared to be spoiled by them, took the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himself taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves
1 Sam. 14. in mount Ephraim, set upon them, and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happy and glorious victory over them. Here was that propheſie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

This done, the small army of Israel made retrait from the pursuit. And although Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take food til the evening, yet his son Jonathas, being infeebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of honey in his passage: for which Saul his father would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seems to have reduced unto the Philistims remembrance their former overthrow, likewise miraculous in the dayes of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the mean while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertook by turns all his bordering enemies;
1 Sam. 14. namely, the Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he prevailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiving the commandement of God by Samuel, he invaded Amalec, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petræa, and the Desart belonging to the Amalekites, from Havilah towards Tigris unto Shur, which bordereth Ægypt; in which warre hee took Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Na-
Exod. 17. tion without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Ægypt in Moses time: he notwithstanding did not only spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoil of the Countrie, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate, to which he was raised when he was of base condition, and, as the Text hath it, little in his own eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there been no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to enjoyn the Israelites to revenge themselves upon that Nation, he was in all unexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance
Deut. 25. 19. of Amalec from under heaven. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag used against the Israelites, especially on those which were over-wearied, faint, sick, and aged people, was now to be revenged on him, and his Nation, above 400. years afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the the innocent: himself having also sinned in the same kind; as these words of Samuel witnesse: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himself (after he had been by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soon after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul untill the day of his death. 1 Sam. 15. 33.

§. V.

Of the occurrents between the rejection of Saul and his death.

NOw while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sons of Ishai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to perform, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might avoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the providence of God, that by his cautious care and wisedome hee sought to avoid the inconveniences or dangers of this life: then do these men mistake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, do no otherwise avoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupefied in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsell at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisedome or foresight, wherewith God hath enriched the mind of man for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdain here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the fury of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sons of Ishai, Samuel, by God directed, made choice of David, the youngest, having refused Eliab, the first born: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet unto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other six brethren, made choice of one whom his father had altogether neglected, and left in the field to attend his flock; for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise, and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seek the life of David: in which bloody mind hee continued till he died, overcome in battell by the Philistims. 1 Sam. 10.

The Philistims having well considered (as it seems) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still and forborn to give impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new tryall of their fortune, as justly fearing that the wrongs, which they had done to Israel, might be repaied with advantage, if ever opportunity should serve their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their antient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselves equall, if not superiour to Israel. The successe of their former wars had for the most part been agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisedome, impute them to second causes; as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarm, whereby their Armie, possessed with needlesse fear, had fallen to rout. Having therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neer to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the trial of a battel, each part kept their ground of advantage for a while, not joyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay between their Camps. Just causes of fear they had on both sides, especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had bin confounded by the angry hand of God. Upon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroak from heaven were to be feared. Goliah of Gath, a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, undertook to defie the whole Hoste of Israel, provoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it self as overcome in grosse, and become vassall unto the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publique notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe to encounter the great strength of Goliah, untill David (sent by his father of an errand to the Camp) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other arms, offensive or defensive, than a sling, wherewith he overthrew that haughty Gyant, and after with his own sword strook off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yeelded themselves as subjects to the Conquerour, according to the covenant on their own side propounded, fled without stay, and were pursued and slaughtered even to their own gates. By this victory the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their Towns were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grievous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deserving. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul, and came upon David, hee then 1 Sam. 16. 13. became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimelech fed David in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his own conquest, taken from Goliah; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also he destroyed the Citie, and smote

1 Sam. 22. 18. with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both child and suckling, both Oxe and Asse, and sheep. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemie to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contrarie to the Commandement and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercy in store for the innocent, for the Lords servants, the Priests of 1 Sam. 14. 23. Israel. Yea, hee would have slain his own son Jonathan, for pittying and pleading Davids innocencie; as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers unreasonable commination. The companions of cruelty are breach of faith towards men, and impiety towards God. The former hee shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him; and again in taking her away from him to whom he had given her: also in that when as David had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworn to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the means he could. His impietie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God, he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Devil this successe followed, that both himself, and his three sons, with his neerest and faithful servants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his body with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung over the walls of Bethsan, and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of ravenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Jabes stolne their carcasses thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Acts 13. 21. Israel, together with Samuel, 40 years, and by himself after Samuel 20. years, according Cedren. pa. 89. Theoph. l. 3. p. 76. Joseph. l. 28. to Cedrenus, Theophilus and Josephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written, that Samuel died; and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of David, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a fair entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained: for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations, crusht the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as lived with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen, and Hercules, and of their issues: upon occasion of the Dores, with the Heraclidæ, moving Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second year of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was David born: after Crideman, later, and in the ninth year: after Bunting in the tenth. For David, saith hee, was thirtie years old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that hee was born in the tenth of the fortie years, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh year of Samuel, Æneas Silvius the son of Posthumus began his reign over the Latines in Alba, who governed that State one and thirtie years. There are who place before him Latinus Silvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from from Æneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilas sate in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King, he ruled that Empire forty years. In this age of Samuel the Dores obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidæ, who then led and commanded the Nation, possest a great part thereof, 328. years before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Æolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen the son of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Phthiotis in Thessaly. But before the time of this Hellen, yea, and long after, Greece had no name common to all the Inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the Plantation of many Colonies, and sundry great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie under their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet every severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned over it. And because this is the farthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedegree of her first planters.

Iapetus (as the poets fable) was the son of Heaven and Earth, so accounted, either becatise the names of his Parents had in the Greek tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Iapetus begat Prometheus, and Ephimetheus: of whom all men have read that have read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion; and Epimetheus, Pyrrha; Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queen. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which wee have spoken else-where. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sons were Xuthus, Dorus, and Æolus: of Dorus and Æolus, the Dores and Æolians had name. The Æoles inhabited Bœotia. The Dores having first inhabited sundry parts of Thessaly, did afterward seat themselves about Parnassus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedæmon: Xuthus the eldest son of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for having diverted from them to his own use some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, he begat on her two sons, Achæus and Ion. Of these two, Achæus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus: and seating himself in Laconia, gave name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and levying an Armie, recovered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtain a great victorie, and thereby such love and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing every one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos or Ægialia: In which Countrie Selinus then raigning, thought it safer to give his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heir, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Town called by his Wives name in Ægialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gave to that Land denomination. But in after-times the Dores assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and overcomming the Achæans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achæi had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achæi driven to seek a new seat, came unto the Ionες, desiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alleged in vain, that Ion and Achæus had been brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they sought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenes, the son of Orestes, in that War.

Thus were the Ionες driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Western coast thereof; on which they built twelve Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least without any universall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ionες into Asia hath been mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. years after the warre of Troy, and 60. years after the descent of the Heraclidæ into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidæ were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. years. Of their Father Hercules many ſtrange things are delivered unto us by the Poets, of which ſome are like to have been true, others perhaps muſt be allegorically underſtood. But the moſt approved Writers think that there were many called Hercules, all whoſe exploits were by the Greeks aſcribed to the ſon of Alcmena, who is ſaid to have performed theſe 12. great labours.

Firſt, he ſlew the the Nemæan Lyon: ſecondly, he ſlew the ſerpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: the third was the overtaking a very ſwift Hart: the fourth was the taking of a wild Bore alive, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadia: the fift was the cleanſing of Augias his Oxe-ſtall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: the ſixt was the chaſing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: the ſeventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: the eighth was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane fleſh: the ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: the three laſt were, to fetch Gerions Beeves from Gades; the golden Apples of the Heſperides; and Cerberus from Hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of theſe I purpoſely omit, as both overlong to be here ſet down, and no leſſe perplexed than the labours themſelves. For ſome by Hercules underſtand Fortitude, Prudence, and Conſtancy, interpreting the Monſters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sun, and his travells to be the twelve ſignes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his works hiſtorically to their own conceits; as well aſſured, that the expoſition cannot have more unlikelihood, than the fables. That hee took Elis, Pylus, Œchalia, and other towns, being aſſiſted by ſuch as either admired his vertues, or were beholding unto him; Alſo that hee ſlew many Theeves and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His travells through moſt part of the world, are, or may ſeem, borrowed from Hercules Libycus: But ſure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indeavours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppreſſion. But after his death, no City of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deſerts of Hercules, with conſtant protection of his Children, perſecuted by the King Euryſtheus. This Euryſtheus was Sonne of Sthenelus, and grand-child of Perſeus; he reigned in Mycenæ, the mightieſt City then in Greece. He it was that impoſed thoſe hard taſks upon Hercules, who was bound to obey him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madneſſe he had committed upon his own children; but as others ſay, becauſe he was his Subject and Servant: wherefore there are who commend Euryſtheus for employing the ſtrength of Hercules to ſo good a purpoſe. But it is ſo generally agreed by the beſt Writers, that Hercules was alſo of the ſtock of Perſeus, and holden in great jealouſie by Euryſtheus becauſe of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous ſervices, wherein hee was imployed, ſo that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many Wives and Concubines above threeſcore Children. Theſe Children Euryſtheus would fain have got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled unto Ceyx King of Thracinia, and from him (for he durſt not withſtand Euryſtheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gave them entertainment, but lent them aid, wherewith they encountred Euryſtheus. Iolaus the brothers ſon of Hercules, who had aſſiſted him in many of his travels, was captain of the Heraclidæ. It is ſaid of him, that being dead he obtained leave of Pluto to live again till he might revenge the injuries done by Euryſtheus: whom when he had ſlain in battell, hee died again. It ſeems to me, that whereas hee had led Colonies into Sicily, and abode there a long time forgotten: he came again into Greece to aſſiſt his couſins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponneſians underſtood that Euryſtheus was ſlain, they took Atreus the Sonne of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mighty, and favoured of the People. Againſt him the Heraclidæ marched under Hyllus, the ſonne of Hercules. But to avoid effuſion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus ſhould fight with Echenus King of the Tegeatæ, a people of Arcadia, who aſſiſted Atreus; with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he ſhould peaceably enjoy what he challenged as his right: otherwiſe the Heraclidæ ſhould not enter Peloponneſus in an hundred years. In that combat Hyllus was ſlain, and the Heraclidæ compelled to forbear their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned under Ariſtodemus (as the beſt authority doth ſhew, though ſome have ſaid, that they came under the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom whom they planted in that Countrey, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achai, over whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurystheus four generations.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened about this age.

ABout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirm. He was by race of the Maones, descended (as Funcius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamxon, who gave name to that people. But this Funcius imagineth Homer the Poet to have been long after these times, rashly framing his Æra according to [a] Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus, and makes seven more of this name to have flourished in divers Cities in Greece. Whence, perhaps, sprang the diversitie of opinions, both of the time, and of the native Citie of Homer. According to this Archilochus, Funcius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Juda, and Numa of Rome. He was called Melesigenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blind men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe ὁμηρεύω: for this Homer in his later time was blind. * Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer lived. So also [b] Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Assyrius in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. years before the Consulship of Marcus Vinutius: which Mercator casteth up in the worlds year 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260. years: and about 250. years before the building of Rome; making him to have flourished about the time of Jehosaphat King of Juda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus above named, mention Authors that make him much antienter. The difference of which authors in this point is not unworthy the Readers consideration, that by this one instance hee may gheſſe of the difficultie, and so pardon the errours in the computations of antient time: seeing in such diversitie of opinions a man may hardly find out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gave being to Homer about 80. years after Troy taken, neer the time that the Heraclidæ returned into Peloponnesus: and * Eratosthenes after Troy 100. years. Theopompus 500. years after the armie of Greece sailed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reign in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. years after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90. years before the first Olympiad: which hee seeks to prove by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander. Philechorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the seating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirms that he lived while Agesilaus governed Lacedæmon, and that Lycurgus in his young years about 100. years after the Ionian plantations, came to visit him, neer 240. years after Troy taken. Herodotus finds Homer flourishing 622. years before Xerxes enterprise against the Grecians: which Beroaldus accounteth at 168. years after the Trojan war. Eusebius seems to make him to have been about the time of Joas King of Juda, 124. years before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie hee notes that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of David, and others in other ages. In his Evangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Assyrius he citeth sundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, he reckoneth many other Greek writers more antient than Homer, as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristæus, Orpheus, Musæus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirm, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it uncertain which of these learned fablers was first born: but hee finds that they lived together some certain years, wherein he confirmes himself by an Epigram, written upon a Trevit, and left by Hesiod in Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both lived 160. years before Rome built: while the Silvii reigned in Alba, about [a] 140. years after the fall of Troy. [b] Euthymenes finds them both 200. years after Troy taken, in the time of Acastus the son of Pelias, King of of Thessaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet lived, neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but only to shew the uncertainty and disagreement of Historians, aswel in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For, the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliads with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In derision whereof Lucian feigning himself to have been in Hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his book with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Semyes, or, after Macrobius, Senemires ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanephersobris was his successour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Solomon. 10

Euseb. & Cass. in Chron. About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Davids time, according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Sylvius then ruling in Italy. And besides the overthrow of that famous state of Troy (which fell 103 years before Davids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northern Nations: but there sprung up somewhat neerly together, six Kingdomes into greatnesse, not before erected. In Italy that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedæmon, Corinth, and the Achai. In Arabia, Syria, Soba, and Damascus, the Adads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kings, which began and ended with the Kings of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites having now altered the forme of government, began to flourish under Kings, of which David, in a few years, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by enterchange of times had subjected the Judæans, corrupted their religion, and held them under in a most abject and and grievous slavery; to wit, the Edomæans, Moabites, Ammonites, Madianites, Ituræans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Jebusites, Gesshurites, Machathites; all which acknowledged David for their Soveraigne Lord, and paid him tribute. 20 30

of Davids estate in the time of Saul.

THe hazzards which David ran into while he was yet onely designed King, and lived as a private man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both armies, whereby he became known to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the sonne of Saul, that he loved him as his own soul: Insomuch as when Saul sought to perswade his sonne that David would assuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause; Jonathan could never be perswaded, never forc'd, nor ever wearied from the care of Davids life, and well doing. It was not long after this signall act of David, but that Saul became exceeding jealous of him, though he were become as his houshold servant, and his Esquire, or Armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an evill spirit, was advised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him upon the Harp, whereby it was thought that he might find ease; which came to passe accordingly. He entertained David for this purpose, and began to favour him, giving him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the jealous Tyrant soon waxed wearie of his good affection, and sought to kill David, being thereunto moved onely through envie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his raving fit, at which time he threw a spear at David that was then playing on his Harp to do him ease. 40 50

Censor. c. 15. & 14 Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of the Frenzie, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmony, Seneca in his third book of Anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes:

and was thereby incurable, howſoever it ſometimes left him, and yeelded unto that Muſick, which God had ordained to be a mean of more good to the Muſician than to the King.

Saul having failed in ſuch open attempts, gave unto David the command over 1000. ſouldiers to confront the Philiſtims withall. For he durſt not truſt him as before, about his perſon, fearing his revenge. Now the better to cover his hatred towards him, hee promiſed him his daughter Merab to wife: but having married her to Adriel, he gave to David his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to preſent him with an hundred foreskins of the Philiſtims: hoping rather (in reſpect of the valour of that Nation) that the Philiſtims would take Davids head, than hee their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Davids victories begat new fears and jealouſies in Saul, hee practiſed with Jonathan, and afterwards with his own hands attempted his life, but his purpoſes were ſtill fruſtrated. After all this he ſought to murther him in his own houſe, but Michol his wife delivered him. So David ſought Samuel at Ramah, and being purſued by Saul, fled thence unto Nob in Benjamin, to Abimeleck, then to Achis the Philiſtim, Prince of Geth: where to obſcure himſelf, he was forc'd to counterfeit both ſimplicitie and diſtraction. But being ill aſſured among the Philiſtims, he covered himſelfe in the Cave of Adullam: and after conveying ſuch of his kinſfolks as were not fit to follow him, into Moab, he hid himſelf in the deſarts of Ziph, Maon, and the hills of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and ſpared his life: as he did a ſecond time in the deſart of Ziph, after his paſſage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the ſecond time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred with which his maſter Saul was known to proſecute him.

1 Sam. 19. 1 Sam. 21. 1 Sam. 24. 1 Sam. 29. Janſen. in Pſal.

Of Achis David obtained * Siglag in Simeon, pretending to invade Judea: but he bent his forces another way, and ſtrook the Amalekites, with other enemies of Iſrael, letting none live to complain upon him. Achis ſuppoſing that David had drawn bloud of his own Nation, thought himſelf aſſured of him: and therefore preparing to invade Iſrael, ſummoneth David to aſſiſt him, who diſſembling his intent, ſeemeth very willing thereto. But the reſt of the Philiſtim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his diſpoſition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himſelf to Siglag. At his return he found the town burnt, his two wives, with the wives and children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers murined, but God gave him comfort, and aſſurance to recover all again: which he did.

* It ſeemeth that Simeon never obtained Siglag till this time, for it is ſaid in the 1 of Sam. c. 27. v. 6. therefore Siglag pertaineth unto the King of Juda unto this day.

This armie of the Philiſtims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three ſons were ſlain. The newes, with Saul's Crown and bracelets, were brought to David at Siglag, in his return from being victorious over Amaleck, by a man of the ſame Nation, who avowed (though falſly) that himſelf at Sauls requeſt had ſlain him. David, becauſe he had accuſed himſelf, made no ſcruple to cauſe him to bee ſlain at the inſtant: and the ſooner, becauſe the probabilities gave ſtrong evidence withall. Otherwiſe it followeth not that every man ought to be believed of himſelf to his own prejudice. For it is held in the law, Confeſſio reorum non habenda eſt pro explorata crimine, niſi approbatio alia inſtruit religionem cognoſcentis. The priſoners confeſſion muſt not be taken for an evidence of the crime, unleſſe ſome other proof inform the conſcience of the Judge. For a man may confeſſe thoſe things of himſelf, that the Judge by examination may know to be impoſſible. But becauſe it is otherwiſe determined in the title de cuſtodia reorum l. ſi confeſſus, & in cap. de pœnis l. qui ſententiam, therefore doth the Gloſſe reconcile theſe two places in this ſort: Si quis in judicio ſponte de ſeipſo confiteatur, & poſtea maneat in confeſſione, id eſt ſatis. If any man in judgement do confeſſe of himſelf, of his own accord, and after doth perſevere in his confeſſion, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable, for death cutteth aſunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him being a King, with whom in effect the ſtrength of Iſrael alſo fell, could not but ſtirre up ſorrow, and move compaſſion in the heart of David.

2 Sam. 1. In F. de queſt. l. 1.

The victorie which the Philiſtims had gotten, was ſo great, that ſome Towns of the Iſraelites, even beyond the river of Jordan, were abandoned by the Inhabitants, and left unto the enemie, who took poſſeſſion of them without any reſiſtance made. Wherefore it may ſeem ſtrange, that a nation ſo warlike and ambitious as were the Philiſtims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and ſeek to make the Conqueſt entire.

Moſt

Most like it seems, that the civill war immediatly breaking out between David and the house of Saul, wherein Juda was divided from the rest of Israel, gave them hope of an easie victorie over both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should enforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessary reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were united.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Davids reign, and the war made by Abner for Isboseth.

AFter the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to advance Isboseth (or Febostus, according to Josephus) though he had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Mephiboseth the first son of Jonathan lived. Against this Abner and Isboseth, David made a defensive war, till Abner past Jordan, and entred the border of Juda; at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and David in Hebron. The armies encountred each other neer Gibeon, where it seemeth that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that combate between the Lacedæmonians and the Argives, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left unslain. The like tryall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horatii and Curiatii, for the Romans and Latines. The same thaslenge Goliah the Philistim made, whom David slew: a custome very antient. Edward the third offered the like tryall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this war of David with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Benjamin, and as many of Juda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there survived not any one to challenge the victory. But the quarrell staid not here; for the Army of Juda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundred and sixty men of Abners companions were slain, and but twenty of Juda; whereof Asahel the brother of Joab was one: who when he would needs pursue
2. Sam. 2. Abner, and by Abners persuasions could not be moved to quit him, he was forced to turn upon him, wounded him to death with the stroak of his speat. For though Asahel were an excellent foot-man, and, as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and, as Josephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great fame if he could have mastered Abner (who, as Asahel perswaded himself, had by being overthrown and flying away, lost his courage) yet here it fell out Eccles. 9. true, That the race is not to the swift.

That this civill warre lasted two years, we find it written in the second of Samuel,
Verse 10. the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is again made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceive that Isboseth had then raigned two years, when this was written, the Warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the party of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew jealousie between him and Isboseth for Sauls Concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appear.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slain by Joab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

2 Sam. 3. 27. ABner, reconciled to David, was anon by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in Davids Favour, and in the commandment of his forces; by which he was grown so powerfull, as David forbare to call him to account: for thus much he confesseth of himself; I am this day weak, and these men, the sonnes
2 Sam. 3. 39. of Zerviah, be too hard for me. In this sort David complained after Abners death; and to make it clear that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publike im-
Verse 29. precation; Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his father's house: and let there be to subject to ulcers, to the leprosie, to lameneſſe, to the ſword, and to povertie, &c. For could any thing have withſtood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Joab might greatly have indangered Davids eſtate, Abner being the mouth and truſt of all the reſt of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This miſchance therefore David openly bewailed, ſo that all Iſrael perceived him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being generall of the men of warre, was of ſuch importance, that the Kings themſelves were fain to give them great reſpect, as hath been already ſhewed more at large. This office Joab held in the army of Juda, and thought himſelf worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtain the whole Kingdome. For he was neer to David in kindred, and had been partaker of all his adverſitie; wherefore hee did not think it meet, that an old enemy ſhould in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature ſo jealous of his dignitie and place, that he afterward ſlew Amaſa his own kinſman, and the Kings, upon the ſame quarrell, taking it in high diſdain to ſee him joyned with himſelf as captain of the hoſte of Juda; much leſſe could hee brook a ſuperiour; and ſuch a one as had ſlain his brother, and been beaten himſelf in battell. But howſoever Joab did hate or deſpiſe Abner, David eſteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Iſrael, excuſing the overſight by which he might ſeem to have periſhed, by affirming that he died not like a fool, nor a man vanquiſhed, But as a man falleth before wicked men, ſo (ſaid he) diddeſt thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour & vertue in him, whom a ſtronger hand deſtroyeth unawares, or whom ſubtilty in free truſt bringeth to confuſion. For all under the Sun are ſubject to worldly miſeries and miſadventures. Howſoever Iſboſeth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he deſpaired greatly of his eſtate, and with him all Iſrael were poſſeſt with great fear: in ſo much as two of Iſboſeths own Captains, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Iſboſeth, and preſenting his head to David, received the ſame reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have ſlain Saul. Iſboſeth being dead, all the Elders of Iſrael repaired to David at Hebron, where he was the third and laſt time annointed by generall conſent.

2 Sam. 4.

§. IV.

Of the flouriſhing time of Davids Kingdom, the taking of Jeruſalem, with two overthrowes given to the Philiſtims, and the conduction of the Ark to the City of David.

WHen David was now eſtabliſhed in the Kingdome, his firſt enterpriſe was upon the Jebuſites, who in deriſion of his force, and confident in the ſtrength of the place (as is thought) manned their walls with the blind and lame of their Citie; which David ſoon after entred, all their other forces notwithſtanding. For having maſtered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of David) he became Lord of Hieruſalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Jebuſites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moſes and Joſhua, and after them almoſt 400 years. There are who expound this place otherwiſe: Except thou take away the blind and the lame, thou ſhalt not come in hither. For ſome think that it was meant by the Idols of the Jebuſites: others, that it had reference to the Covenant made long before with Iſaac, and Jacob: the one blind by nature and age, the other made lame by wreſtling with the Angel; and that therefore till thoſe (that is, till that Covenant) be broken, David ought not to moleſt them. But for my ſelf, I take it with Joſephus, that they armed their walls with certain impotent people at firſt, in ſcorn of Davids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. years againſt all the children of Iſrael; Joſhua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it alſo againſt David.

2 Sam. 5.

When he had now poſſeſt himſelf of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and received congratulatory Embaſſadours and preſents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines, and married moe wives, by whom he had ten ſons in Jeruſalem, and by his former wives, he had ſix in Hebron where he reigned 7 years.

The Philiſtims hearing that David was now anointed King, as wel of Juda as of Iſrael, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warm in his ſeat. And being encountred by David at two ſeverall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giants, they were at both times overthrown. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

2 Sam. 5.

Then David aſſembled 30000. choice Iſraelites to conduct the Ark of God from the house of Abinadab in Gibea to the Citie of David, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the son of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Ark, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harm, when it was shaken. But after three years it was with great solemnity brought into the Citie with sacrifices, musick, dances, and all signs of joyfulnesse, in which David himself gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Ark, and afterward told him in scorn, That he was uncovered as a fool in the eyes of the maidens his servants; namely, that he forgat his regall dignity both in apparell and behaviour; and mixed himself among the base multitude, dancing as fools doe in the wayes and streets: not that she disliked Davids behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred up, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was delivered lastly by force, and remembring the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the son of Ishai had built this his greatnesse: together with the many new wives and concubines imbraced since his possession of Jerusalem, made her break out in those despitefull tearms, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chro. c. 3. This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatned, not in vain, that he would require the bloud of a man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars which David had made were just, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appears how greatly those Princes deceive themselves, who think by bloud-shed and terrour of their wars, to make themselves in greatnesse like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercy and goodnesse, or seek the blessednesse promised by our Saviour unto the peace-makers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Davids founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he received both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heirs, and that happy promise of the everlasting Throne, that should be established in his seed.

§. V.

The overthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

SOon after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and unable to make any invasion upon Israel in haste. For it is written, Accepit frænum Amgaris è manu Philisthæorum; which place our English Geneva converts in these words, And David took the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latin of Junius giveth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong City of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneva hath it in the marginall note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cæsarea, set on the frontier of Palæstina, at the entrance into Judæa and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retrait in all their invasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier town of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Amma, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Pliny in his first book, and chap. 13. This exposition is made plain, and confirmed in the first of Chro. the 18.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1.

Junius in c. 8. of the 2. of Sam.

There was no nation bordering the Jewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kind, but inforc'd them to come down into their territorie, for all yron work whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David, were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

1 Sam. 13.

After this he gave them four other overthrows: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came between. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose spear weighed 300. shekles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poises: at which time Abishai succoured David, and slew the Philistim, whereupon the the Counsellours and Captains of David (lest the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazzard himself in any battell. The second and third incounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neer Gesur, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his adversity hee sought succour, and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not known. 2 Sam. 21. v. 17

The Rabbines feign that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which lived under his protection in Sauls time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had been alwayes enemies to Israel, and took all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites; which David well observed, for he destroyed two parts of the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon toward Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the son of Rehob King thereof. The place is set down in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which David made upon the Syrians.

IT is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as hee went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) bee referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed upon. Junius thinkes that the article (hee) hath relation to David, who finding Toha oppresst by Hadadezer, overthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the antient and most received opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, hee was in farre better case to have proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) hee had now left no enemie on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountains upon him at his return.

Again, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: Hee had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those uncultived places, by which hee was to have marched before hee could have reached Euphrates, or any part thereof. But we find that David returned to Jerusalem, after hee had twice overthrown the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appear, that it was the Syrian, and not king David, that was going to inlarge his border, as afore is said.

The King of Syria, Damascena, and of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was overthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, and the loss of his own country which adjoined to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an Army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer, and too soon for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This King of Damascus, Josephus, (out of Nicholaus an antient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as also those other Adads were: which now began to grow up in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus under his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: having also sackt the adjoyning Cities of Betah & Berathi, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomie calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Toha or Thoi, whose country of Hamath joyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the holy Land the Reader may perceive) sent his son Joram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had war with Adadezer, & partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse; all which, together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and 2 Sam. 8.

the best of all the spoiles of other Nations, David dedicated unto God at his return. Junius translated the words (Clypeos aureos) by umbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold, but the bosses only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chains. But because Roboam made shields of brasse in place of these of Adadezer, at such time as Shicah the Egyptian sack'd the Temple of Jerusalem, it may be gathered thereby that those of Adadezer were golden shields.

2 Sam. 1. This done, David sent Embassadours to Hanum King of the Ammonites, to congratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David, in the time of his affliction under Saul, had been relieved by Nahash, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill advised, and over-jealous of his estate, used Davids messengers so barbarously, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beards, and their garments) as hee thereby drew a warre upon himself, which neither his own strength, nor all the aydes purchased, could put off or sustain. For notwithstanding that hee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vassalls of Adadezer twenty thousand, and of Maachah and Ishtob thirteen thousand (for which hee disbursed a thousand talents of silver) yet all these great Armies, together with the strength of the Ammonites, were by Joab and his brother Abishai easily broken and put to ruine: and that without any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written, that when the Aramites fled, the Ammonites also retraited into their Cities, the one holding themselves within the walls, the other in their desarts adjoyning, till Joab was returned to Jerusalem.

Hadadezer hearing that Joab had dismissed his Armie, assembled his forces again, and sent all the Companies that hee could levie out of Mesopotamia; who under the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, assembled all the ablest men of Israel, and marched toward the Syrian Armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia; to wit, at Helam, a place no lesse distant from Damascus, towards the North-east, than Jerusalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off journey that ever he had) because hee was now Lord of Damascus, which lay in the midway. Hee also possest himself of * Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward strongly fortified; and this Citie was but one dayes journey from Helam, and the river Euphrates. So had hee two safe retraits, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damascus. In this encounter between David and the Syrians, they lost 40000. horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their Armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers, footmen, and so Junius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the Armie of Israel consisting of footmen, could hardly have slaughtered 40000. horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foot. So are the chariots taken in this battell, numbred at 7000. in the first of Chronicles the ninth; in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that served in them, with the conductors, are included: so as there dyed of the Syrians in this warre against David, before he forc'd them to tribute, 100000. footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that Joab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites, before Rabbah. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength again, and afflicted the Kings of Juda often: but the Kings of Israel they impoverished even to the last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians, from the partie and confederacy of Ammon: He sent out Joab the Lieutenant of his Armies to forrage and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbah, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Israelites mastered and possest. The Kings Crown which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his own head, and carried away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Jerusalem, following the war of Uriah his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremity, and ready to be entred: yet Joab in honour of David forbare the last assault, & entrance thereof, till his masters arrivall. To the people he used extreme rigour (if wee may so call it being exercised against heathen Idolaters,) for some of them hee tare with harrowes towes, some hee sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kills, in which hee baked tyle and brick.]

Of Davids troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

BUt as victory begetteth securitie, and our present worldly felicity a forgetfulnesse of our former miseries, and many times of God himself the giver of all goodnesse; so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise observation of his Lawes and Commandements: For having now no dangerous apparent enemie (against whom hee was wont to ask counsell from the Lord) hee began to be advised by his own humane affections and vain desires: For hee was not onely satisfied to take Uriahs wife from him, and to use her by stealth; but hee imbrodered his adultery with Uriahs slaughter, giving order to his trustie servant Joab to marshall him in the front or point of those Israelites, which gave an assault upon the suburbs of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibilitie of prevailing. And that which could no lesse displease God than the rest, hee was content that many others of his best servants and souldiers should perish together with Uriah, hoping thereby to cover his particular ill intent against him. After which hee began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse, and his dayes then to come were filled with joyes and woes interchangeable, his troden-down sorrows began again to spring, and those perils which he had pulled up by the roots (as hee hoped) gave him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased GOD to take the witnesse of Davids own mouth against him, as David himself did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have slain Saul, he had then appeared as worthy of reprehension as the other was of the death hee suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded unto him his own errour in the person of another, to wit, of him that took the poor mans sheep that had none else, the bereaver being Lord of many; Hee then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And hereof, although it pleased God to pardon David for his life, which remission the Prophet Nathan pronounced; yet hee delivered him Gods justice together with his mercy in the tenour following; Now therefore the sword shall never depart from thy house, &c. because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, & hast slain Uriah with the sword of the children of Ammon. Soon after this, David lost the child of adulterie which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his own son Ammon, being in love with his half sister Thamar, by the advice of his cousin-german the sonne of Shimeah Davids brother, possest her by force; which when hee had performed, hee thrust her from him in a careless and despitefull manner. Two years after which foul and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the feast of his sheepshearing: not perchance in revenge of Thamars ravishment alone; but having it in his heart to usurp the Kingdome, in which, because he could not in any sort be assured of Amnon, he thought his affairs greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his own sister, and then despised her; the other after a long dissembled malice first made his own brother drunken, and then slaughtered him, which done, he fled away, and lived under the safeguard of Talmai King of Gessur, neer Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. Thirdly, when Absalom by the invention of Joab (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought again, first to the Kings favour, and then to his presence, he began instantly to practise against David his father, seeking by the pretence of common justice, and by lowly and familiar manner to all men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win unto himself a popular reputation. Here began the great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of Davids sinne.

people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, & was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set upon on the sudden, durst not trust himself in his own Citie of Jerusalem, nor in any other walled town for fear of surprise: but incamped in the fields and desarts with some 600. of his guard, and few else. The Priests hee left in Jerusalem with the Ark of God, from whom he desired to be advertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Hushai his trustie friend and servant, praying him to make himself in 2 Sam.15. all his outward actions and counsells of Absaloms party and confederacy, thereby the better to discover unto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolting Counsellour, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the son of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the fire of whose hatred Davids prosperity had smothered, but his adversity illightned) holding himself upon the advantage of a mountain side, cast stones at David, and most
2 Sam.16. despightfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no private revenges, forbad Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his revenge, to his sonne Salomon. Absalom being now possest of Jerusalem, was advised by Achitophel to use his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolvedly adhere to Absalom and his cause, without fear of being
2 Sam.17. given up upon a reconciliation between them. This salvage and impious (though crafty counsell) Achitophel indeed urged for his own respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction, who most of all other inflamed Absalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly fortold David: I will raise up evill against thee out of thine own house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them unto thy neighbour, and he shall lye with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. He
2 Sam.c.12. v.11. also gave advice to Absalom, that himself with an armie of 12000. men might be employed at the instant for the surprizing of David; which had willingly been imbraced
2 Sam.17. v.14. by Absalom, had not Hushai Davids faithfull servant given counter-advice, and swayed it: perswading Absalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel to pursue his father, than by such a troop, which Davids valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Absalom, and advantage of time gained by David, was indeed, after God, the losse of the one, and delivery of the 2 Sam.17.23. other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his own estate, and then forsook both the party and the care of Absalom, and of his own life.

David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Jordan, possessing himself of Mahanaim in the Tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isboseth himself in the war against David after Sauls death seated himself. To which place there repaired unto him Shobi the son of Nahash the Ammonite, whom David loved, the same which Josephus calleth Shiphar. And though it be greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after Hanums overthrow: in thankfulnesse whereof hee relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to Davids assistance Machir of Lodebar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his companie.

In the mean time both the King and Absalom prepared to fight; Absalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Joab held with David; an office next the King himself, like unto that of the Maiors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, & disposed the forces he had to Joab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalom. But Joab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, and news brought him
2 Sam.18.14. that Absalom hung by the hair of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to return and kill him, hee himself with his own servants dispatcht him.

It

It appeared also by the sequell that Ioab affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, Dauid yet liuing; and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the present aduantage offered. 2. Sam. 18.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to Dauid, he mourned and sorrowed, not only as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outlined all his worldly ioyes, and seene euerie delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victorie, couered themselues also in the citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather deserued death than recompence. Whereupon Ioab presenting himselfe before Dauid, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the armie. For first, he told him that he had discountenanced his faithfull seruants, who had that day preserued his life; inferring that nothing could bee more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resoluedly expose themselues to great perils for his sake: but on the contrarie, grieue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Absalom at an easie rate. Secondly, he vrged that it was generally beleeued, that he loued his enemies & hated his friends; and that he witnessed by this his mourning, that he had not anie respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull seruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Absalom liued, than in the victorie by their faithfulnesse and approued valour gotten.

Lastly, he vsed this preualent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publickly to his men of warre, that they would all that verie night abandon him, and returne; concluding with this fearefull threatning, And that will be worse vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these ouer-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Ioab raised Dauid from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the citie among the people, whom he assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the armie of Absalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship, the same which Absalom had giuen him, and which Ioab now enioyed. For Dauid doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, he might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandement. 2. Sam. 19.

This done, the King marched towards Iordan homeward, where in his passage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face: but this remission was but externall, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephibosheth his excuse, whom Ziba had falsly accused and betrayed. 2. Sam. 19. 23.

He also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Host, to follow him to Ierusalem, that he might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King. 2. Sam. 19. 38.

At Gilgal on this side Iordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in Dauid, the Armie brake, & Dauid returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from Dauid, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that manie of the people, of the ou Tribes, and in effect of all but Iuda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. Dauid imployed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also because hee conceiued that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Ioab had. He receiued commandement from Dauid to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which hee forestowed: but being onward on his way, Abishai, Ioabs brother, was sent after him, with Dauids guard and best Souldiers, whom also Ioab accompanied: and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no lesse iealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered, in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, hee pursued Sheba; and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the citie with that furie, that the citizens by the perswasions of a wise woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Ioab ouer the walls: which done, he retraited his Armie to Ierusalem, and commanded, as before, all the Host of Israel. 2. Sam. 20. 10. 2. Sam. 20. 12.

The next act of Dauid, was the deliuery of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers crueltie. Dauid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeers, came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yeelded to giue them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also, if wee may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, aswell in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and indangered; only he spared Mephibosheth the sonne of Ionathan, both for the loue he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two sonnes of Rispah, whom she bare vnto Saul, and the fiue sonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites: Iunius cals this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, snee whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid when he slew Goliah in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had anie humane respect in the deliuerie of her children, it is onely knowne to God. 2. Sam. 21.

Now where the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, & signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinred, as in the 19. verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliah, whose speare was weightie as a Weauers beame, when as by the same eclipsis it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliah; Goliah himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forreine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number & qualitie, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirty Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were sixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinarie, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue beene giuen vpon meere consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre against the Ammonites & Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neerenesse of bloud vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approued seruices. All these Coronels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue beene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readines for anie occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required, into the field, verie farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea, or thirty times as manie. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and been hardned with his aduersities. Others there were verie manie, and principall men in their seuerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the speciall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be ghessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruia, who had beene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and only Ioab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremitie. 2. Sam. 23. 39.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeares or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enioyed about seuen yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remoue all impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Iuda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Ioab, with other Captaines of his Armie; who after nine nine moneths and twentie dayes trauell, returned with the account & regiſter of all the people able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteen hundred thouſand, beſides Leui and Beniamin, whereof in Iuda and the cities thereof fiue hundred thouſand, and in Iſrael eight hundred thouſand. 2. Sam. 24. 1. Chr. 21.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three puniſhments, whereof he might ſubmit himſelfe to which he pleaſed; to wit, ſeuen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein he ſhould be vnproſperous in all attempts, and be chaſed by his enemies; or a generall peſtilence to laſt three dayes: Dauid made choice to bow himſelfe vnder the hand of God only, and left himſelfe ſubiect to that cruell diſeaſe, which hath no compaſsion or reſpect of perſons, of which there periſhed 70. thouſand. And hereby hee hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; wherof he giueth this diuine reaſon, For his mercies are great. 2. Sam. 24.

§. VIII.

Of the laſt acts of Dauid; Adonijahs faction; the reuenge vpon Ioab and Shimei.

LAſtly, when he grew weake and feeble, and paſt the acts and knowledge of women, he was yet aduiſed to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake eſtate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-rid, Adonijah his eldeſt ſonne (Ammon & Abſalom being now dead) hauing drawn vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Prieſt, began manifeſtly to prepare for his eſtabliſhment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldeſt now liuing of Dauids ſonnes, and a man of goodly perſonage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others ſuppoſe) he preſumed to carrie the matter without reſiſtance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Berſabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithfull promiſe, that Salomon her ſon ſhould reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the ſame thing vnto the King, & ſeconding her report of Adonijah his preſumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Prieſt, Nathan the Prophet, & Benaiah the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commiſſion to anoint Salomon, and to ſet him on the Mule whereon himſelfe vſed to ride in his greateſt ſtate: which done, Salomon, attended, and ſtrongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, ſhewed himſelfe to the people. Theſe tidings being reported to Adonijah, he preſently abandoned his aſſiſtants, and for the ſafety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the preſent Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two eſpeciall cares, whereof he was deſirous to diſcharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be diſturbed by ſome rebellion againſt Salomon, the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he ſought by all meanes to aduance, and make the buſineſſe publicke. To bring theſe intentions to good effect, he ſummoned a Parliament, conſiſting of all the Princes of Iſrael, the Princes of the ſeuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power; who did repaire vnto Ieruſalem. 1. Reg. 1. 1. Chron. 28. 1.

In this aſſembly the King ſtood vp, & ſignified his purpoſe of building the Temple, ſhewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Herein he took occaſion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, ſhewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iacob in his bleſſing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himſelfe was pleaſed to make choyce of him among all his fathers ſonnes. In like manner he ſaid that God himſelfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his ſucceſſor: whereupon hee earneſtly charged both the people and his ſonne to conforme themſelues vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords houſe, which Salomon was choſen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke, according to the forme which God himſelfe had appointed; and ſo laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntarie contribution. 1. Chr. 29. 9.

The Kings propoſition was ſo well approued by the Princes & people, that whereas hee himſelfe had giuen three thouſand talents of gold, and ſeuen thouſand of ſiluer; they added vnto it ſeuen thouſand of gold, & ten thouſand of ſiluer, beſides braſſe, iron, and and iewels, heartily reioycing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being so well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, & receiued fealtie of all the Princes & people of the Land, & of all the Princes his brethren, the sonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus established King, his Father Dauid finding himselfe euen in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mighty words; Take heed to the charge

1. King. 2. 3. of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes, and his commandements, and his iudgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which, GOD fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (saith GOD himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit vpon the
1. Kin. 2. 20. Throne of Israel.

Secondly, he aduised him concerning Ioab, who out of doubt had serued Dauid from the first assault of Ierusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, sauing that he fastened himselfe to Adonijah (his master yet liuing) & thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath [redacted] left cruelty vnreuenged, so was it his will that Ioab should drinke of the same cup, whereof he hath enforced other men to taste, & suffer the same violence which himself had vniustly strooken others withall, Qui gladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner & Amasa of their liues, hauing against the one the pretence onely of his brothers slaughter, whom Abner had slaine in the time of warre, and could not auoyd him: against the other but a meere iealousie of his growing great in the fauour of Dauid. And though Ioab assured himselfe that Abner & Amasa being dead, there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhaiah the sonne of Iehoiadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in peeces. For Dauid giueth this cause to Salomon against
1. King. 2. Ioab, that he slue the Captaines of the hoste of Israel, and shed bloud of battell in peace, and to this apparant & iust cause, it is not improbable but that Dauid remembred the ill affection of Ioab towards Salomon, which Ioab made manifest by the vntimely setting vp
1. King. 2. of Adonijah, Dauid yet liuing. Some other offence Ioab had committed against Dauid, of which in these words he put his sonne Salomon in minde; Thou knowest also what Ioab the sonne of Seruiah did to me, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Absalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the proud words vsed to him when he mourned in Mahanaim for Absalom; or whether it were the publishing of Dauids letter vnto him for the killing of Vriah, thereby to disgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are silent. True it is, that those great men of warre doe oftentimes behaue themselues exceeding insolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their seruice done, as also because they flatter themselues with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne manie a worthy man otherwise deseruing great honour and respect.

He also gaue order to Salomon to rid himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at Dauid, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise Dauid spared Shimei all the time himselfe liued, yet being dust and in the graue, hee
1. King. 2. slew him by the hand of Salomon his sonne. Hence it seemeth that King Henry the seuenth of England had his patterne, when he gaue order to Henry the eight to execute Pool as soone as himselfe was buried, hauing made promise to the King of Spaine when he deliuered Pool vnto him, that while hee liued hee would neuer put him to death, nor suffer violent hands to be laid vpon him.

And yet did not the execution of Ioab yeeld vnto Salomon any such great profit or assurance as he hoped for. For he found a young Adad of Idumæa, & Rezin of Damascus
1. King. 11. to vexe him: who, as the Scriptures witnesse, were emboldened to enterprize vpon Salomon, hearing that Dauid slept with his fathers, and that Ioab the Captaine of the Host was dead. Now when Dauid had reigned in all fortie yeares, to wit, in Hebron 7. yeers, and in Ierusalem three and thirty, he died.

For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internall gifts and graces he so farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtie apart, he was said by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Psalmes which he wrote, witnesse his pietie and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to

Paulinus:

Paulinus: David Simonides noster, Pindarus, & Alcæus, Flaccus, quoque Catullus, & Serenus, Christum lyra personat, & in decachordo Psalterio ab inferis suscitat resurgentem; David (saith he) our Simonides, Pindarus, Alcæus, Horace, Catullus and Serenus, hee playeth Christ on his Harp, and on a ten-stringed Psalter hee raiseth him up rising from the dead. And being both a King and a Prophet, he foretelleth Christ more lightsomly and lively than all the rest.

The book of the Psalmes, saith Glycas, was divided, ordered and distinguished by Ezekias: but whether all the Psalms were written by David, it is diversly disputed. For Athanasius, Cyprian, Lyranus, and others conceive divers Authors answering the titles of the severall Psalmes, as Moses, Salomon, and the rest hereafter named; and that only 73. Psalmes were composed by David himself, namely, those which are intituled ipsius David. For the 50. and the 72. with the ten that follow, are bestowed on Asaph the son of Barachia, eleven other on the sons of Korath; and eleven are ascribed to Moses, to wit, the 89. and the ten following, and so they are intituled in the old Hebrew Copies, though the vulgar and Septuagint (three excepted) stile them otherwise. The supposed nine Authors of these Psalms which David wrote not, Sixt. Senensis nameth as followeth; Salomon, Moses, (whom Aben Ezra, contrary to Hierome, maketh one of Davids singers) Asaph, Ethan-Eziachi, Eman-Eziaira, Idithum, and the three sons of Chore. But S. Chrysostome makes David the sole Author of all the Psalms, and so doth S. Augustine, reasoning in this manner: Although (saith he) some there are that ascribe those Psalms onely to David, which are over-written ipsius David, and the rest intituled ipsi David, to others, this opinion (saith he) Voce Evangelica Salvatoris ipsius refutatur, ubi ait quòd ipse David in spiritu Christum dixerit esse suum Dominum, quoniam Psalmus 109. sic incipit, Dixit Dominus Domino meo, Sede à dextris meis, &c. The voyce of the Gospell refutes this opinion, where it saith, that David himself in the spirit called Christ his Lord; because the 109. Psalme begins thus: The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, &c. Lastly, his testimonies are used both by Christ and the Apostles, and hee was as a pattern to all the Kings and Princes that succeeded him.

His Story, and all his particular actions, were written by the Prophets, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad, as it is in the first of Chron. 29. vers. 19. For the severall parts of the books of Samuel which intreat chiefly of David, were, as it seems, written by these three holy men.

Constantine Manasses hath an opinion, that the Trojans during the time of the siege sought for succour from David, and that he stayed neuter in that warre. But it seemeth that Manasses did miscast the time 'twixt David and the Trojan warre. For it is generally received that Troy fell between the times of Abdon and Sampson Judges of Israel, about the worlds year 2848. and David died in the year 2991.

Cap. 7. §. 6. 7. In his Annals translated out of Greek into Latin by Joannes Leunclaius.

Of the treasures of David and Salomon.

HIs treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22. of the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand thousand talents of silver, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more than any King in the world possest besides himselfe, and his sonne, to whom he left it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirty & three cartload, and a third of a cartload of silver, allowing two thousand weight of silver or six thousand pound sterling to every cartload, besides threescore and seventeen millions of French Crowns, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimony of the Scriptures, exceeding all beliefe. For that any riches were left him, it doth not appear, seeing that the Judges had not any treasure, nor any soveraign power to make levies; but when they went to the wars they were followed by such voluntaries as the severall tribes by turns gave them: seeing also that Saul who was of a mean parentage, and perpetually vexed and invaded by the Philistims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territorries being exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possest by his enemies.

Vers. 14.

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how David within the space of not very many years, might amasse up such mighty treasures. For though parsimony be it selfe a great great revenue, yet needs there must have been some other great means. It seems that he made the uttermost profit of all that he had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his 9. book and last chapter de Præparatione Evangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that David, among other preparations for the Temple, built a Navie in Melonis (or, as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a city of Arabia, and from thence sent men to digge for gold in the Iland Urphe, which Ortelius thinks was Ophir, though Eupolemus in this place of Eusebius (erring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea: from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury. Pineda l. 4. de Rebus Salomonis, c. 1. thinks that David did this way also enrich himself, and citeth this testimonie of Eupolemus: and yet certainly David had many other wayes to gather riches. Much land doubtlesse he gained by conquest from the Canaanites and Philistims, besides those fruitfull vallies neer Jordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Syria, and other countries bordering the Israelites. These demaines belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he took in his warres, which were not able to redeem themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, 1 Chro. 17. that Jehonathan was over his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the cities, in the towns; that Ezri was over the labourers that tilled his ground; Simei over the vineyards, and Sabdi over the store of the wine; Baal Hanan over the olive trees, and Joash over the store of the oyle: also that he had herdsmen that had charge over his cattell, both in the high lands and in the plains, over his Sheep, Camels and Asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandrie and cattell, the ancient Kings every where held, both before and after Davids time. For wee read of Pharaoh, that hee spake to Joseph to appoint some of his brethren, or of their servants, to be rulers over his cattell. Wee read of Uzzia, that he loved husbandrie, had much cattell, and plough-men, and dressers of Vines: likewise wee read it in all Greek Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did specially consist in their Herds and Flocks; whereof it were needlesse to cite Augeas and Admetus, or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning David it is not unlikely, but that those captives which were not imployed in husbandrie, were many of them used by him in all sorts of gainfull professions, as the ancient Romans in like manner used their slaves.

Gen. 47.
2 Chron. 26.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions, which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearly were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Toha and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which hee conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis, By the law of capitation, or head money, every man rich or poor paying half a sicle of the Sanctuary, which is about as much as fourteen pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand five hundred and seventie thousand fighting men were numbred by Joab. Now although this law of capitation bee thought by some very learned, not to have been perpetuall (which opinion of theirs nevertheless they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David upon this occasion is not unlikely to have put it in practise. And by these means might hee be able to leave those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seem that of this great masse of gold and silver left by David, the least part was his own in private; and so will it appear the lesse wonderfull that hee left so much. Of his own liberalitie wee find, that hee gave to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seven thousand talents of silver: a great summe, but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuary it self were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continuall encrease, without any losse or diminution ever since the time of Moses and Joshuah. The revenues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defrayed the daily expences, and maintained the Priests and Levites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and the people which remained at home, had the other half; whereby all the country received benefit of the victory, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single share.

1 Chron. 21.

Numb. 31. 27.

Out

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given to the Souldiers; namely, one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoil of Midian, thirty two thousand women being taken, the Armie had sixteen thousand of them for slaves, and the Congregation had other sixteen thousand; but out of the sixteen thousand given to the Armie, were exempted two and thirty for the Lords tribute; Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twenty. By this means, the lesser that the Armie was which had exposed it self to danger, the greater profit had every Souldier; but when it consisted of many hands, they who remaining at home were fain to undergoe more than ordinarie travell in domesticall affaires, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lords tribute was alwayes certain, yea many times it was increased, either by some speciall commandement, as when all the gold, and silver, and other metalls found in Jerico, were consecrated unto God; or by thankfulnesse of the Rulers and People, as when after the victorie obtained against the Midianites without the losse of one man, all Jewells, Bracelets, Earerings, and the like, were offered up, as voluntarie presents. Num. 31. 40. Jos. 6. 19. Num. 31. 50.

Now howsoever the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden down by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies never gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot otherwise be, than that the wealth of the Sanctuarie must have been exceeding great; as containing above one hundredth part of all the money and other goods found by the Israelites in the whole Land of Canaan; and of all that was purchased by so many victories, as they obtained against the bordering Nations. For that this treasurie was not defrauded of the due portion, it is evident; seeing that before the time of David and his Lieutenant Joab, it is recorded that Saul and Abner, and before them Samuel, had used to dedicate of the spoiles obtained in war, to maintain the house of the Lord: the like whereof may be well presumed of the former Judges and Captains of other Ages. Certain it is, that the Conquest of David brought into the Land far greater abundance of riches, than any former victories had purchased, those of Joshua perhaps excepted: but these vast summes of an hundred thousand Talents of silver, may seem rather to have been made up, by the addition of his winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid up in many former Ages, than to have been the meer fruits of his own industrie. 1 Chron. c. 26. v. 27. & 28.

Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them; for he received of yearly revenues with his tributes 666. Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also six rich Returns from the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage every three years, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth year of his reigne, and ruled fortie years. Besides this, all Judæa and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of Palmyrena, of Ituræa; all of Idumæa, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizites, Hivites, Jebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subjected. A Talent of gold is 770. french crowns. 1 King. 10. 14. 1 King. c. 9. v. 20. & 10. v. 29.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdome of Israel reduced by David, who after 40. years reign, and 70. years of life, dyed in a good age, full of daies, riches, & honour, and was buried in the Citie of David. It is written by Josephus that there was hid in Davids Tombe a marvellous quantitie of treasures, insomuch as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chasmanæi, or race of Macchabees, called himself King) one thousand and three hundred years after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himself of Antiochus then besieging Jerusalem; & afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and silver therin. And it was an antient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discovered by the Spaniards, they inriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers grave, it would hardly be believed, in regard of the great exactions with which hee was fain to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the riches which hee got otherwise, or which were left unto him: were it notwithall considered that his want of money grew from such magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulchre of David the Scriptures have no mention, but onely the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the 1 Chro. 29. 28. *Joseph. Ant. §. X.

Of the Philistims, whom David absolutely mastered: and of sundry other contemporaries with David.

OF the Philistims, whose pride David was the first that absolutely mastered, in this conclusion of David's time somewhat here may be spoken.

They descended of Casloim, who, according to Isidor and Josephus, was one of the sonnes of Misraim, and was surnamed Philistim, as Esau was surnamed Edom, and Jacob Israel. There were of them five Cities or petrie principalities, namely, Azotus or Asdod, Gaza or Accaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Accaron. It seemeth that Casloim was the first founder of this Nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Egyptians.

1 Sam. 6.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Abimelech which loved Sara, Abrahams wife.

Gen. 20.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time of famine, Abimelech then residing at Gerar, in the border of Idumæa; which Abimelech fancied Isaac his wife, as his father had done Sara.

Gen. 26.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till David's time: perhaps the government was turned into Aristocratical. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howsoever Achis be named King of Gath, the same to whom David fled, and who again gave him Siklag to inhabit in Sauls time.

Jud. 16. 1 Sam. 18. 29. 1 Sam. 21. 11. 1 King. 2.

After him we read of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Shimei travelled to fetch back his fugitive servant, what time the seeking of his servant was the losse of his life. Jeremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palastin or Philistim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of the wars of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Judges, of Saul and David, and therefore I shall not need to collect the particulars in this place.

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvii King of Alba, called Latinus Silvius, who is said to have ruled that part of Italy fifty years. And about his fourteenth year Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontida, without regall name governed Athens during their life.

The reasons which moved the Athenians to change their government, were not drawn from any inconvenience found in the rule of soveraignty, but in honour of Codrus only. For when the Gracians of Doris, a region between Phocis, & the mountain of Oeta, sought counsell from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered, that then undoubtedly they should prevail and become Lords of that State, when they could obtain any victory against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answer, withdrew himself from his own forces, and putting on the habit of a common souldier, entred the Camp of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountred, was himself forthwith cut in pieces.

Eupales the 31. King of Assyria, which others account but the 30. began to rule that Empire, about the 13. year of David, and held it 38. years.

Neer the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraclida, the sonne of Euristhenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclida in Lacedæmon: in honour of which Agis, his successours were called Agida, for many years after. Hee restored the Laconians to their former libertie: he overcame the Citizens of Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute: he condemned them and theirs to perpetuall slaverie; whereof it came, that all the Messenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after call Helots.

In like sort from the Sclavi came the world Slave. For when that Nation issuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seized upon the country of Illyria, & made it their own by conquest, their victory pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselves by by a new name, Slavos, which is in their language Glorious. But in after times (that warmer Climate having thawed their northern hardiness, and not ripened their wits) when they were trodden down, and made servants with their neighbours, the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their bondmen Slaves, using the word as a name of reproach: in which sense it is now current through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. year of David, and say, that Acheſtratus was the fourth King of this race, the same whom Euſebius calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth year of Salomon. Euſeb. in Chro.

In the tenth year of Acheſtratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus, assisted by the Ioues, built Epheſus in Caria, who after the adjoyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was slain by the Carians, whose countrie he usurped. He was buried (saith Pauſanias) in one of the gates of Epheſus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set over him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next province to Epheſus on the sea coast of Aſia the lesse) he inlarged his Dominions upon the Æoles, which joyneth to Ionia: and that his posteritie governed the Cities of Epheſus and Erythra by the name of Baſilidæ in Strabo his own time. Of the expedition of the Iones how they came hither out of Peloponneſus, I have * spoken already upon occasion of the return of the Heraclidæ into Peloponneſus, wherein, with the Dores, they expelled the Achai, and inhabited their places in that land; though this of the Ionos succeeded that of the Heraclidæ 100. years.

The Citie of Epheſus became exceeding famous: first, for the Temple of Diana therein built, which had in length 425. foot, and 220. in breadth, sustained with 127. pillars of marble, of 70 foot high: whereof 27. were most curiously graven, and all the rest of choice marble polisht, the work being first set out by Cteſiphon of Gnoſſos. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timothy was Bishop; to whom and to the Epheſians, Saint Paul wrote his Epistles so intituled. The other City possest by Androclus in Æolis, was also universally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythræa, who lived 740. years before Christ was born. S. Augustine avoweth that a Roman Proconsul shewed him in an antient Greek copie certain verses of this Propheteſſe, which began (as S. Augustine changed them into Latine) in these words: Jeſus Chriſtus Dei Filius, Salvator; Jeſus Chriſt Son of God, the Saviour.

Plin. l. 2. c. 58. & l. 7. c. 37.

About the time that Joab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres began to govern in Egypt, the same that was father in law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Euſebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the City of Magneſia in Aſia the lesse founded; the same which is seated upon the river Maander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiochus. In this territorie are the best horses of the lesser Aſia bred; whereof Lucan:

Et Magnetis equis, Minya gens cognita remis.

About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the Inhabitants of Chalcis in Eubœa, according to Servius, with whom Strabo joyneth the Cumæans of Æolis, saying, that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the Citie. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous scholar of Iſocrates. Euſebius and Caſſiodor find the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 31. year of David, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Metinos the son of Badezar, brother to Jezabel, who married Achab King of Iſrael; and between the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95. years.

Serv. in Æneid. 3. Strabo. l. 5.

In this time also Acaſtus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, of which there were thirteen in descent before the State changed into a Magistracie of ten years. Some writers make it probable, that the Æolians, led by Graus, the grand nephew of Orestes, possest the Citie and Iland of Thebes about this time. In the 32. year of David, Hiram began to reign in Tyre, according to Joſephus, who saith that in his twelfth year Salomon began the work of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Joſephus, to misreckon times, which in this point he doth so strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any accompt. For it is manifest, that Hiram sent Messengers, and Cedars unto David, soon after his taking of Jeruſalem, which was in the very beginning of Davids reigne over Iſrael, when as yet hee had reigned onely seven years in Hebron over the house of Juda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned above 30.

years before Salomon; unlesse more credit should be given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plain words of Scripture contradicting them. For, that it was the same Hiram which lived both with Dauid and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainly manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

OF SALOMON.

Of the establishing of Salomon: of birth-right, and the cause of Adonijah's death, and of Salomons wisedome.

SALOMON, who was brought up under the Prophet Nathan, began to reign over Iuda and Israel, in the year of the World 2990. He was called Salomon by the appointment of God: he was also called Ieduthia, or Theophilus, by Nathan, because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched Embassadors towards him, congratulating his establishment: a custome between Princes very ancient. Whence we read that Dauid did in like sort salute Naoan King of the Ammonites, after his obtaining the Kingdome.

2 Sam. 10.

The beginning of Salomon was in blood, though his reign were peaceable. For soon after Dauids death he caused his brother Adonijah to be slain by Benaiah the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonijah his desiring by Bersheba, that the young maid Abishag (whom they had put to Dauid to cherish him in his latter dayes, to keep him warm) might be given to him. Whatsoeuer the pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and sought the Kingdome contrary to the will of Dauid, whom God ordained towards Salomon. And yet it is said that a word is enough to the wise, and he that sees but the claw may know whether it be a Lion or no: so it may seem that to the quick sighted wisedome of Salomon, this motion of Adonijahs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had been Concubines to a King, might not after be touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wished Absalom to take his fathers Concubines as a part of the Royalties. And Dauid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them up, and they remained widowed until their death. And this it seems was the depth of Isbosheths quarrell against Abner, for having his fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seem too in the words of God by Nathan to Dauid, I have given thee thy Masters house, and thy Masters wiues. And in the words of Saul upbraiding Ionathan, that he had chosen Dauid to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hereupon perhaps was some reference to this purpose of Adonijah, to marry with her that was alwaies present with Dauid in his latter dayes, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdome to Salomon. There may be divers further occasions, as either that hee would learn such things by her as might be for the advantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Dauids last Testament, or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonijah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, & with the customes of the Iewes: yet the kings of the Iewes were so absolute, as they did therin, & in all else, what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to use this prerogatiue authority in transferring the birth-right to a younger son: namely of Iacob differing Ruben, and giving the birth-right (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom he made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeared by the words of Bersabe and Nathan to Dauid, and of Ionathan to Adonijah. For as for popular election, that it was necessary to confirme, or that the refusall of the people had authority to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it now here appears in the stories of the Jewes. It is said indeed that the people made Saul King at Galgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before, no man can doubt, In like manner elsewhere the phrase of choosing or making their King, is to be expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselves a King, it is said, Thou shalt make him King whom the Lord shall chuse. 1 Sam. 11.14. Deut. 17.30.

But to proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that hee put Adonijah to death, he rid himself also of Joab, and three years after of Shimei, as David had advised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who took part with Adonijah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because he had born the Ark of God before his Father, he spared his life. And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife: for so Eusebius out of Eupolemus calls him. He offered a thousand sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing unto him in a dream, bade him ask what he would at his hands; Salomon chooseth Wisedome, which pleased God. And God said unto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy self long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy self, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words: by which wee may informe our selves, what desires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the covering after long life in respect of our selves, cannot but proceed of self-love, which is the root of all impiety: the desire of private riches is an affection of covetousnesse, which God abhorreth; to affect revenge, is as much as to take the sword out of Gods hand, and to distrust his justice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers slaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God; but because Salomon desired wisedome onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to give him withall that which he desired not. And I have also given thee (saith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of Wisedome our Commentators stretch to almost all kindes of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures, the Scripture testifieth; though no doubt the chief excellencie of Salomons wisedome, was in the knowledge of governing his Kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wisedome, the Scripture telleth how soon he judged the controversie between the two harlots. 1 King. 2. 1 King. 4.33. 1 King. 3.9.

Of Salomons building and glorie.

HEe then entred into league with Hiram King of Tyre, from whom he had much of his materials for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God: for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father David, and another from God. For like as it is written of David, that He called Salomon his sonne, and charged him to build a house for the Lord of Israel: so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine precept to these words, Behold, a son is born unto thee, &c. He shall build an house for my Name. 1 Chr. 22.6. Tost. 9.26. in 1 Chron.

He began the work of the Temple in the beginning of the fourth year of his reign, at which time also he prepared his fleet at Esiongabar to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supply the charge of so great a work. For, that the Temple was in building, while his fleets were passing to and fro, it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggim trees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof the form and example was given by God himself) many learned men have written, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barradas, Azorius, Villalpandus, pineda, and others, to whom I refer the Reader. 1 King. 6. 1 Chr. 28.19.

For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed 30. thousand Carpenters, 10. thousand every month by course: he also used 80. thousand Masons in the mountain, and 70. thousand labourers that bare burdens, which is conceived, he selected out of the Proselites, besides three thousand three hundred masters of his work; so as he paid and employed in all, one hundred eighty three thousand and three hundred men; in which number the Sidonians, which were farre more skilfull 1 King. 5.

skilfull in hewing timber than the Israelites, may (as I think) be included. For Hiram caused his servants to bring down the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and 1 King. 5. 9. thence sent them in raffes to Joppe, or the next port to Jerusalem. For in the second of Chronicles the second Chapter, it is plain, that all but the thirty thousand Carpenters, and the over-seers, were strangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres
1 King. 5. 11. King of Egypt. In recompence of all this timber and stone, Salomon gave Hiram twenty thousand measures of wheat, and twenty measures of pure oyle yearly. Eusebius out of Eupolemus in the ninth book of his preparation, the last Chapter, hath left us a Copie of Salomons Letter to Suron (which was the same as Huram and Hiram) King of Tyre, in these words:

REx Salomon Suroni, Tyri, Sydonis, atque Phœnicia regi, Amico paterno salutem. Scias me à Deo magno David patris mei regnum accepisse, cumque mihi pater præcepit templum Deo, qui terram creavit, condere, ut etiam ad te scriberem præcepit: Scribo igitur, & peto à te ut artifices atque fabros ad ædificandum Templum Dei mittere velis.

KIng Salomon to King Suron, of Tyre, Sydon, & Phœnicia King, & my fathers friend, sendeth greeting. You may understand that I have received of the great God of my father David, the Kingdome: and when my father commanded me to build a Temple to God which created heaven and earth, he commanded also that I should write to you: I write therefore to you, and beseech you, that you would be pleased to send me Artificers and Carpenters to build the Temple of God.

To which the King Suron made this answer.

SUron, Tyri, Sydonis, & Phœnicia Rex, Salomoni Regi salutem. Lectis literis, gratias ego Deo, qui tibi regnum patrii tradidit: & quoniam scribis fabros, ministrosq; ad condendum Templum esse tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia hominum octaginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Judæa, virum in rebus architecturæ mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessariis non egeant, & Templo Dei condito, ad nos redeant.

SUron of Tyre, Sydon and Phœnicia King, to King Salomon greeting: When I read your Letters, I gave God thanks who hath installed you in your fathers kingdome. And because you write that Carpenters and Workmen may be sent to build Gods Temple, I have sent you fourscore thousand men, and a Master-builder, a Tyrian, born of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessaries be provided for them, Josam. l. 8. c. 2 and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to us.

The Copies of these Letters were extant in Josephus time, as himself affirmeth, and to be seen (saith he) Tàm in nostris quàm in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our own, as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different termes, as the Reader may find in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse between Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or Josephus set it down, but so, that in substance there is little difference
1 King. 5. from the 1. v. to the 9. between the one and the other.

The like Letter in effect Salomon is said to have written to Vaphres King of Egypt, and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Salomon, find that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vaphres King of Egypt, gave Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eusebius, I do not find any such addition of magnus in Eusebius, in the last chapter of that ninth book; neither is it in Josephus in the eighth book and second chapter of the Jewes Antiquities: it being a vain title used by some of the Assyrian and Persian Kings, and used likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in later times it grew common, and was usurped by mean persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord, Salomon fortified Jerusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had been the ancient Josam. l. 8. c. 2 Metropolis of the Canaanites, before Joshua's time: so did he Gaza of the Philistims: he built Berothon, Gerar, and the Millo or munition of Jerusalem. For Pharaoh (as it seemeth in favour of Salomon) came up into the edge of Ephraim, and took Gezar, which place the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the sword, and burnt their Citie. The place and Territory he gave Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable, that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the war, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of these neighbours, which Pharaoh performed. But hee thereby taught the Egyptians to visit those parts again before they were sent for; and in his son Rehoboams time Sheshack this mans successor did sack Jerusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manasse, on this side Jordan, and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the desart of Juda, or (as Josephus thinks) Palmira in the desart of Syria; which Palmyra, because it stood on the utmost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Davids conquest when he wan Damascus, it may seem that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best Art that that age had. Josephus calls this place Thadamora, by which name (saith he) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his book of Hebrew places, calls it Thermeth. In after-times, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building, Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twenty talents of gold received from Hirams servants; Salomon offered Hiram twenty towns in or neer the upper Galilee, but because they stood in an unfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refused them, and therefore was the territory called Chabul. Joseph. l. 8. ant. c. 2. Joseph. l. 8. ant. c. 2.

These towns, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, Non quod Gentes ibi haberent: sed quia sub ditione regis Gentilis erat, Not that it was possest by the Gentiles (saith Nauclerus) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsoever it were, it is true that Salomon in the 21. year fortified those places which Hiram refused. Further, he made a journey into Syria Zobah, and established his tributes; the first & last warre (if in that expedition he were driven to fight) that he made in person in all his life. Hee then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Desarts of Idumæa, from whence he visited Eziongaber and Eloth the uttermost place of the South of all his Territories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I have described in the Story of Moses.

§. III.

Of Salomons sending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about Salomons riches, and of Pineda's conceit of two strange passages about Affrick.

HEre Salomon prepared his Fleet of ships for India, with whom Hiram joyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert seamen. From this part of Arabia which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet passe to the East-India, which was not farre off, namely, to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Molucca's, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the abundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and recover a great quantity from thence, and with lesse labour than they do in any one part of Peru, or new Spain.

The return which was made by these Ships amounted to four hundred and twenty talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eighth, it is written 450. talents: whereof 30. talents went in expence for the charge of the Fleet, and wages of men, and 420. talents, which makes five and twenty hundred and twenty thousand Crowns, came cleer. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1 Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of six hundred sixty and six talents of gold; that summe, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yearly, and which came to him, besides those profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a Countrey in the East-Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedy return to Jerusalem from the East-Indies, than in three years; and that Tharsis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath been already declared in the first book. c. 8. §. 9. 10. 13. Lib. 4. de rebus Salomonis c. 6. & 15.

Only it remaineth that I should speak somewhat of Pineda his strange conceits, who being a Spaniard of Bætica, would fain have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tarteſſus, which is the Southwest corner of that Province, to bee the Tharſis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seems, but for love of his own Countrey, and because of some affinity of sound between Tharſis and Tarteſſus. For whereas it may seem strange that it should be three years ere they that took ship in the Red sea, should return from the East-Indies to Jeruſalem, this hath been in part answered already. And further the intelligent may conceive of sundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other traffick, and in their land-carriages between Jeruſalem and the Red sea, and perhaps also else-where: so that wee have no need to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Africk, that so they might be long a comming home.

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Israelites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them could not have been ignorant of) was along the Mediterran sea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconveniences, and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome land-carriage between Jeruſalem and the Red sea, through dry, desart, and the theevish Countreys: and within 30. mile of Jeruſalem at Joppe, or some other haven in Salomons own Country, have laden and unladen their ships.

But this direct course they could not hold (saith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis, in largeneſſe greater than all Africk and Aſia, being swallowed up in the Atlantick Ocean, hindred Salomons ships from passing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this hee allegeth Plato in Timæo. But that this calamity happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the straits of Gades were filled with mud, and made unpassable, that there could be no comming to Gades by the Mediterran sea; or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scoureth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner, where this huge Iland is supposed to have stood; or that Salomons ships being in the Red sea, should neglect the golden Mines in the East-Indies (which were infinitely better and neerer to the Red sea, than any in Spain) to seek gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Africa; it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himself that hath also the rich Peru in the West, fortifieth in the East-Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parts no lesse quantity of gold (the small territory which hee there possesseth considered) than in Peru.

De rebus Sal. l. 4. c. 10. 11.

The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which elsewhere he dreams of: supposing whereas Jonas sailing to Tharſis the City of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming above twelve thousand English miles along the Mediterran seas, and so through the straights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about Africa, cast up Jonas upon the shore of the Red sea; that so he might have perhaps some six miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Ninive. This conceit hee grounds onely upon the ambiguity of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the Red sea (as if we should call it mare algoſum, the sea full of weeds) for the Red sea. But in Jonas c. 2. 5. it is generally taken in the proper signification for weeds, and not as Pineda would have it, who in this place against his own rule (which elsewhere he giveth us) supposeth strange miracles without any need. For this long voyage of the Whale, finished in three dayes, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of Jonas in the belly of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessity of this miracle, we send it back unto him, keeping his own rule, which in this place he forgets; Miracula non ſunt multiplicanda. And again, Non ſunt miracula gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nova fingenda. Miracles are not to be multiplied without neceſſitie, nor delivered without cauſe, nor feigned at pleaſure. Therfore we leave this man in his dreams, which (were he not otherwise very learned and judicious) might be thought unworthy the mentioning. But to proceed with our storie of Salomon.

Ing. I.

The Queen of Saba's comming from farre to Salomon, (as seems, from Arabia Fœlix, & not, as some think, from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocall magnificence, and his resolving of her difficult questions; those are set down at large in the Text. But herein Josephus is greatly mistaken, who calls this Queen of Saba Nicaules, Nicaules, the succeſſor (ſaith he out of Herodotus) of thoſe thirty and eight Egyptian Kings which ſucceeded Meneus the founder of Memphis; adding, that after this Egyptian, and the father in law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was left off in Egypt. For as it is elſe-where proved that the Queen was of Arabia, not of Egypt and Ethiopia; ſo were there other Pharaohs after the father in law of Salomon. Yea, above three hundred years after Salomon, Pharaoh Necho ſlew Joſias King of Juda. Joſ. ant. 8.1,2. 1 *King.c.*23. 2 *Chro.c.*25. *Jer.c.*46.*v.*2.

It is alſo written of Salomon, that he kept in garriſons fourteen thouſand Chariots, and twelve thouſand horſemen; that he ſpent in Court every day thirty meaſures of fine flower, threeſcore meaſures of wheat, one hundred ſheep, beſides ſtags and fallow Deer, bugles and fowle; four thouſand ſtalls of horſes he had for his Chariots and other uſes, and for the twelve thouſand horſemen of his guard. For, the ten thouſand ſtalls in the firſt of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for ſo many horſes, whence in the ſecond of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but four thouſand ſtalls or teems, and in every teeme ten horſes, as Junius and the Geneva underſtand it. He was ſaid to be wiſer than any men, yea than were Ethan the Ezrahite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda; to which Junius addeth a fift, to-wit, Ezrack. For the Geneva maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Joſephus writes them, Athan, Æman, Chalceus and Donan the ſons of Hemon. Hee ſpake three thouſand Proverbs, and his ſongs were one thouſand and five, whereof either the moſt part periſhed in the Captivity of Babylon, or elſe becauſe many acts of Salomons were written and kept among the publick Records of Civill cauſes, and not Eccleſiaſticall, therefore they were not thought neceſſary to bee inſerted into Gods Book. 1 *King.*4.32.

§. IIII.

Of the fall of Salomon, and how long he lived.

NOw as he had plenty of all other things, ſo had hee no ſcarcity of women. For beſides his ſeven hundred Wives, hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commanded that none of his people ſhould accompany the daughters of Idolaters) he took Wives out of Egypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when he fell a doting, his Wives turned his heart after other gods, as Aſteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemoſh of Moab.

Theſe things God puniſhed by Adad of Idumæa, Rezin of Damaſcus, and by Feroboam his own ſervant, and one of the maſters of his works, who by the ordinance of God tare from his ſon Roboam, ten of the twelve parts of all the territorie he had. Deus dum in peccatores animadvertit, aliorum peccatis utitur, quæ ipſe non fecit: God puniſhing ſinners, uſeth the ſins of others, which he himſelf wrought not. P. Mart. in reg.

In the reign of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence, and that great Indian voyage already mentioned. Fortie years he reigned; how many he lived, it is not written, and muſt therefore be found only by conjecture. The moſt likely way to gheſſe at the truth in this caſe is, by conſidering the actions of David before and after Salomons birth, whereby we may beſt make eſtimation of the years which they conſumed, and conſequently learn the true, or moſt likely year of his nativity. Seven years David reigned in Hebron: in his eighth year hee took Jeruſalem, and warred with the Philiſtims, who alſo troubled him in the year following. The bringing home of the Ark ſeems to have been in the tenth year of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the year enſuing, at which time hee had ſufficient leiſure, living in reſt. After this he had warres with the Philiſtims, Moabites, Aramites, and Edomites, which muſt needs have held him five years, conſidering the Aramites of Damaſco raiſed warre againſt him; after ſuch time as hee had beaten Hadadezar; and that in every of theſe warres, he had the entire victory. Neither is it likely, that theſe ſervices occupied any longer time, becauſe in thoſe dayes and places there were no wintering camps in uſe, but at convenient ſeaſons of the year Kings went forth to warre, diſpatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their Armies, partly upon the ſpoyle of the enemies country, partly upon the private proviſion which every ſouldier made for himſelf. The 17. year of David, in which he took Mephiboſheth the ſon of 2 *King.*7.*v.*1. 2 *Sam.c.*11. *v.*1. 1 *Sam.c.*17. *v.*17. & 18.

of Jonathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the year following to have begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to tryall of a battell (for Joab after the victorie, returned immediately to Jerusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre, taking up all the Summer. Davids personall expedition against the Aramites, wherein he brought all the tributaries of Adadezer under his own allegeance, appears manifestly to have been the next years work, wherein he did cut off all means of succour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab, and Idumæa being now at his own devotion. By this reckoning it must have been the 20. year of Davids reign, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which hee sent forth Joab to besiege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Uriahs wife. So one half of Davids reigne was very prosperous: in the other half hee felt great sorrow, by the expectation, execution, and sad remembrance of that heavie judgement laid upon him by God for his foul and bloody offence.

Now very manifest it is, that in the year after the death of that child which was begotten in adultery, Salomon was born, who must needs therefore have been nineteen years old or thereabout when he began to reign at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. year of his fathers reign, who reigned in all forty.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of David, as may be collected out of ensuing Actions: for two years passed ere Absolon slew his brother Ammon; three years ere his father pardoned him, and two years more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seems to have been one years work. So the rebellion it self, with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amasa, and the rest, may well seem to have been in the 30. year of Davids reign.

Whether the three years of famine should be reckoned apart from the last years of war with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to conjecture. Plain enough it is, that in the ten remaining years of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for the three years of famine, for four years of want, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his own last infirmitie, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeed it seems that the warre with the Philistims was but one years work, and ended in three or four fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or Nob neer unto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims undertook, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Israel, and perhaps emboldened by Davids old age: for he fainted now in the battell, and was afterwards hindered by his men from exposing himself unto danger any more. So David had six or seven years of rest, in which time it is likely that many of his great men of Warre dyed (being of his own age) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonijah found little succour in the broken party of Joab the sonne of Zervia.

1 King. 2. 9. & 3. 7. At this time it might both truly be said by David to Salomon, Thou art a wise man; and by Salomon to God, I am but a young child: for nineteen years of age might well agree with either of these two speeches.

Nevertheless there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himself a child, that he was but eleven years old when hee began to reign. Of these Rabbi Salomon seems the first Author, whom other of great learning and judgement have herein followed: grounding themselves perhaps upon that which is said of Absalons rebellion, that it was after forty years, which they understood as years of Davids reign. But whereas Rehoboam the sonne of Salomon was 41. years old when he began to reign, it would follow hereby that his father had begotten him, being himself but a child of nine or ten years old; the difference between their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who reigned 40. years) were but eleven years old when his reign began. To avoyd this inconvenience, Josephus allows 80. years of reign to Solomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needs no confutation. Some indeed have in favour of this opinion, construed the words of Josephus, as if they included all the years of Salomons life. But by such reckoning hee should have been 40. years old at his Fathers death; and consequently should have been born long before his Father had wonne Jerusalem; which is a manifest untruth. Wherefore the 40. years

remembred in Absolons rebellion, may either seem to have reference to the space between Davids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought upon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to Josephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation) four years; which passed between the return of Absalon to Jerusalem, and his breaking out.

§. V.

Of Salomons writings.

THere remain of Salomons workes, the Proverbs, the Preacher, and the song of Salomon. In the first hee teacheth good life, and correcteth manners; in the second, the vanity of humane nature; in the third, he singeth as it were the Epithalamion of Christ and his Church. For the Book intituled, The wisedome of Salomon, (which some give unto Salomon, and some make the elder Philo the Author therof) Hierome and many others of the best learned make us think it was not Salomon that wrote it. Stylus libri Sapientiæ (saith Hierome) qui Salomonis inscribitur, Græcam redolet eloquentiam; The Stile of the Book of wisedome, which is ascribed to Salomon, savoureth of the Gracian eloquence; and of the same opinion was S. Augustine, and yet he confesseth in the nineteenth Book, and twentieth Chapter of the Citie of God, that the Authour of that Book hath a direct foretelling of the passion of Christ in these words: Circumveniamus justum, quoniam insuavis est nobis, &c. Let us circumvent the righteous, for he is unpleasing to us, he is contrary to our doings, he checketh us for offending against the Law, he makes his boast to have the knowledge of God, and he calleth himself the son of the Lord, &c. and so doth the course of all the following words point directly at Christ. Hier. ad Cromatium. Sap. 2.

The Books of Ecclesiastes, Proverbs and Cantica Canticorum, Rabbi Moses Kimchi ascribeth to Isay the Prophet. Suidas and Cedrenus report, that Salomon wrote of the remedies of all diseases, and graved the same on the sides of the Porch of the Temple, which (they say) Ezechias pulled down, because the people, neglecting help from God by prayer, repaired thither for their recoveries. S. Sen. fol. 62. Reinecc. in Jul. Hist.

Of Salomons Books of Invocations, and Inchantments to cure diseases, and expell evill spirits, Josephus hath written at large, though (as I conceive) rather out of his own invention, or from some uncertain report, than truly.

He also speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the root in Salomons ring dispossest divers persons of evill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly, so strange an example of humane frailtie hath never been read of as this King: who having received wisedome from God himself, in honour of whom, and for his onely service, he built the first and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Israel and Judæa, not by the law of Nature, but by the love of God, and became the wisest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the perswasion of a few weak and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forsake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Syracides writeth in this manner: Salomon reigned in a peaceable time, and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that hee might build a house to his Name, and prepare the Sanctuary for ever; How wise wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a flood? Thy mind covered the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and dark sentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles, and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus he concludeth: Thou didst bow thy loynes to Women, and wast overcome by thy body; thou didst stain thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath upon thy children, and felt sorrow for thy folly, cap. 47.

§. VI.

Of the Contemporaries of Salomon.

NEer the beginning of Salomons reign, Agesilaus the third of the Heraclidæ in Corinth; Labotes in Lacedamon; and soon after Silvius Alba, the fourth of the Silvii, swayed those Kingdomes: Laosthenes then governing Assyria; Agastus and Archippus the second and third Princes after Codrus, ruling the Athenians.

In

In the six and twentieth of Salomons reign, Hiram of Tyre dyed, to whom Baliastus succeeded, and reigned seventeen years, after Mercators account; who reckons the time of his rule by the age of his sons. Josephus gives him fewer years. Theophilus Antiochenus against Antolicus finds Bozorius the next after Hiram, if there be not some Kings omitted between the death of Hiram and the reign of Bozorius.

Vaphres being dead, about the twentieth of Salomon, Sesac or Shishak (as our English Geneva termes him) began to govern in Egypt, being the same with him whom Diodorus calleth Sosachis; Josephus, Susac; Cedrenus, Susesinus; Eusebius in the volume of the Egyptian Kings, Smendes; and in that of the Hebrewes, Susac. Josephus in the eighth of his Antiquities, reproveth it as an errour in Herodotus, that he ascribeth the Acts of Susac to Sesostris, which perchance Herodotus might have done by comparison, accounting Sesac another Sesostris, for the great things he did.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostris I have spoken already in the story of the Egyptian Princes: onely in this he was reproved, that he caused four of his captive Kings to draw his Caroch, when he was disposed to be seen, and to ride in triumph: one of which four, saith Eutropius, at such time as Sesostris was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually back upon the two foremost wheeles next him; which Sesostris perceiving, asked him what he found worthy the admiration in that motion: to whom the captive King answered, That in those he beheld the instability of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddenly carryed about, and became the highest, and the upmost part was as suddenly turned downward, and under all: which when Sesostris had judiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like servitude in the future. Of this Sesastris, and that hee could not be taken for Sesac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

Of Salomons Successors untill the end of Jehosaphat.

§. I.

Of Rehoboam his beginnings; the defection of the ten Tribes, and Jeroboams Idolatrie.

REhoboam the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitesse, now forty years old, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was annointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were assembled: who attended a while the return of Jeroboam as yet in Egypt, since he fled thither, fearing Salomon. After his arrivall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to be eased of those great Tributes laid on them by his father, Sic enim firmius ei fore Imperium, si amari mallet quàm metui, so should his Empire (saith Josephus) be more assured, if hee desired rather to be beloved then feared: whereof hee took three dayes to deliberate before his answer; of whom therefore it could not be said as of David, that hee was wiser than all his Teachers. For as of himself hee knew not how to resolve, so had hee not the judgement to discern of Counsels; which is the very test of wisedome in Princes, and in all men else. But notwithstanding that hee had consulted with those grave and advised men, that served his Father, who perswaded him by all means to satisfie the multitude: hee was transported by his familiars and favourites, not onely to continue on the backs of his subjects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting falsly of greatnesse exceeding his fathers) he threatned in sharp, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heavier, and more unsupportable loads on them. But as it appeared in the successe, those younger advisers greatly mistook the nature of severity, which without the temper of clemency is no other than cruelty it self: they also were ignorant that it ought to bee used for the help, and not for the harm of subjects. For what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cords or fetters have ever lasted long, but those which have been twisted willed and forged by love onely? His witlesse parasites could well judge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things else, it sufficed and enabled them sufficiently for the places they held. But this answer of Rehoboam did now a little advance Jeroboams designes. For being foretold by the Prophet Ahijah of his future advancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples love into hate) confirmed and gave courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Israel: the people cryed out, What portion have we in David? wee have no inheritance in the Sonne of Jshai. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to Davids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledging that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebels, they forgat both the bands of nature, and their duty to God; and, as all alienate resolved hearts doe, they served themselves for the present, with impudent excuses. And now over-late, and after-time, Rehoboam sent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hatefull to all his Subjects, to pacifie them: whom they instantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speed, and recovered Jerusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and fourscore thousand chosen men, Shimei in the person of God commanding to the contrary, all was stayed for the present. In the mean time Jeroboam the new King fortified Sichem on this side, and Penuel on the other side of Jordan; and fearing that the Union and exercise of one Religion would alienate the peoples hearts again to the House of David, and having in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatry, he set up two Calves of gold for the children of Israel to worship, impiously perswading them that these were the Gods, or at least by these hee represented those Gods which delivered them out of Egypt: and refusing the service of the Levites, hee made Priests of such gods. It must needs be that by banishing the Levites which served Judah and Salamon through all Israel, Jeroboam greatly enriched himself: as taking into his hands all those Cities which were given them by Moses and Joshua; for as it is written, The Levites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Juda. &c. This irreligious policie of Jeroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatry that never could be rooted out, untill Israel for it was rooted out of the Land) was by Prophecy and Miracles impugned sufficiently when it first began; but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Jeroboam could not be moved now by the Authority of Abia, who from the Lord had first promised unto him the Kingdome; not by the withering of his own hand as hee stretched it over the Altar, which also clave asunder according to the signe, which the man of God had given him by the commandement of God, who again recovered and cured him of that defect; yet he continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for he held it the safest course in policie to proceed as he had begun. This impious invention of Jeroboam, who forsook God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a modern Historian compared with the policies of late Ages; observing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian born. Sic qui hodiè (saith he) politici nuncupantur, & propria commoda præsentesq; utilitates sibi tanquam ultimum finem constituunt, causam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt: pro ipsa tuenda, promovenda, conservanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. Si injuria proximo irroganda, si justitia honestatisq; leges subvertendæ, si religio ipsa pessundanda, si denique omnia jura divina & humana violanda, nihil intentatum, nil per fas nefasq; relinquendum censent; cunctaruant, omnia pereant, nihil ad ipsos, modò id, quod è re sua esse sibi persuadent, obtineant, ac si nullus sit qui talia curet, castigareve possit Deus: So they who are now called Politicians, proponding to themselves, as their utmost end and scope, their own commoditie and present profit, are wont to allege the case of state forsooth, as the principall point to bee regarded: for the good of the state, for advancing, preserving, or encreasing of the state, they think that they may doe any thing. If they mean to oppresse their neighbour, to overturn all lawes of justice and honesty, if Religion it self must goe to wrack, yea, if all rights of God and man must be violated, they will try all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing, let all goe to ruine, what care they, so long as they may have what they would, as though they should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power to correct them.) first it had done to bring in this vile Idolatry of the ten Tribes. Upon this ground Amazia the Priest of Bethel counselled the Prophet Amos not to propheſie at Bethel, For (ſaith he) it is the Kings Court. Upon this ground even Jehu that had maſſacred the Priests of Baal, in zeal for the Lord, yet would not in any wiſe depart from that politique ſinne of Jeroboam the ſonne of Nebat, which made Iſrael to ſinne. It was reaſon of ſtate that perſwaded the laſt famous French King Henry the fourth to change his Religion, yet the Proteſtants whom he forſook, obeyed him, but ſome of the Papiſts whom hee followed, murdered him. So ſtrongly doth the painted vizor of wiſe proceeding delude even thoſe that know the foul face of impietie lurking under it: and behold the wretched ends that have ever followed it; whereof Jehu, and all the Kings of Iſrael had, and were themſelves very great examples.

Of Rehoboam his impietie; for which he was puniſhed by Seſac: of his end, and Contemporaries.

WHile Jeroboam was occupied in ſetting up his new Religion, Rehoboam on the other ſide, having now little hope to recover the Provinces loſt, ſtrengthened the principall places remaining with all endeavour; for he fortified and victualled fifteen Cities of Juda and Benjamin: not that he feared Jeroboam alone, but the Egyptians, to whom Jeroboam had not only faſtned himſelf, but withall invited them to invade Judæa: laying perchance before them the uncountable riches of David and Salomon, which might now be eaſily had, ſeeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemies to the Judæans. So as by thoſe two waies (of late years often trodden) to wit, change of Religion, and invitation of forraign force, Jeroboam hoped to ſettle himſelf in the ſeat of Iſrael, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatry in few years after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam having alſo, as hee thought, by fortifying divers places, aſſured his eſtate, forſook the law of the living God, and made high Places, and Images, and Groves, on every high Hill, and under every green Tree.

And therefore in the fifth year of his reign, Seſac or Shiſhac before ſpoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom, as well Adad of Idumæa, as Jeroboam, were familiar, and his inſtruments; entred Judæa with twelve thouſand Chariots, and threeſcore thouſand Horſe, beſides foot-men, which Joſephus numbers at four hundred thouſand. This Armie was compounded of four Nations: Egyptians, Lubæans, Succæans, and Cuſites. The Lubæans were Lybæans, the next bordering Region to Egypt, on the Weſt-ſide. The Cuſites were of Petræa, and of the deſart Arabia, which afterward followed Zera againſt Aſa King of Juda. The Succæans according to Junius his opinion, were of Succoth, which ſignifieth Tents: he doth ſuppoſe that they were the Troglodita, mentioned often in Plinie, Ptolomie, and other Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the banks of the red Sea, in 22. degrees from the line Northward, about ſix hundred Engliſh miles from the beſt and Maritimate part of Egypt: and therefore I do not think that the Succims or Succai were thoſe Troglodita, but rather thoſe Arabians which Ptolomie calls Arabes Ægyptii, or Ichthyophagi, which poſſeſſe that part of Egypt behind the mountains called Alabaſtrini, and the red Sea, farre neerer Egypt, and readier to be levied than thoſe removed Savages of the Troglodita.

With this great and powerfull Army, Seſac invaded Judæa, and (beſides many other ſtrong Cities) wan Jeruſalem it ſelf; of which, and of the Temple, and Kings houſe, he took the ſpoyle, carrying away (beſides other treaſures) the golden ſhields which Salomon had made, in imitation of thoſe which David recovered from Adadezer, in the Syrian war: theſe Rehoboam ſupplyed with Targets of braſſe, which were fit enough to guard a King of his quality: whom Syracides calleth, The fooliſhneſſe of the people.

From this time forward the Kings of Egypt claimed the ſoveraignty of Judæa, and held the Jewes as their Tributaries: Seſac, as it ſeems, rendring up to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may be gathered out of the word of God, where promiſing the deliverance of Juda after their humiliation, he doth notwithſtanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt, in theſe words: Nevertheleſſe they (to wit, the Judæans) ſhall be his ſervants, that is, the ſervants of Seſac.

After

After this overthrow and dishonour, Rehoboam reigned twelve years, and his losses received by Sesac, notwithstanding, he continued the war against Jeroboam all his lifetime. After his death Jeroboam governed Israel four years.

Rehoboam lived 58. years, and reigned 17. his story was written at large by Shemeiah and Hiddai the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Nathan, and the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Governours for life after Codrus, governed in Athens. Abdastrartus, or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fift of the Heraclidæ in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the sixt) and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Over the Latines reigned Sylvius Alba, Sylvius Atys, the fourth and fift of the Sylvii. Euseb. Chron.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastrartus King of Tyre was murthered by his Nurses sons, or foster-brethren, the elder of which usurped the Kingdome twelve years.

Toward his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, began to govern Assyria, the 34. King thereof: and not long after Astartus, the son of Baleastartus, recovered the Kingdome of Tyre from the Usurpers.

§. III.

of the great battell between Jeroboam and Abia, with a Corollarie of the examples of Gods judgements.

Abijah the son of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. He raised an Armie of four hundred thousand, with which hee invaded Jeroboam, who encountred him with a double number of eight hundred thousand: Both Armies joyned neer to the Mount Ephraim, where Jeroboam was utterly overthrown, and the strength of Israel broken: for there fell of that side five hundred thousand; the greatest overthrow that ever was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recovered Bethel, Jeshanah, and Ephron. Soon after which discomfiture, Jeroboam died: who reigned in all 22. years. Abijah, the better to strengthen himself, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may bee gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he reigned but three years, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were. 2 Chro. 16. 2.

Here we see how it pleased God to punish the sins of Salomon in his son Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and Traitor: and then by the successor of that Egyptian, whose daughter Salomon had maried, therby the better to assure his estate, which while he served God, was by God assured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings; and when he forsook him, it was torn asunder by his meanest Vassals. Not that the Father wanted strength to defend him from the Egyptian Sesac; For the son Abijah was able to levie four hundred thousand men, and with the same number he overthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites; and slew of them five hundred thousand; God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when, and where it pleaseth him. And as in those times the causes were expresst, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People; the same being both before, and at the instant delivered by Prophets: so the same just God, who liveth and governeth all things for ever, doth in these our times give victory, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw down Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of Israel, alwayes the causes are set down, that they might be as presidents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Davids time for three years, For Saul and his bloody house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffered all sorts of afflictions, and sorrowes in effect, for Uriah. Salomon had ten Tribes of twelve torn from his son for his Idolatrie. Rehoboam was spoiled of his riches and honour by Sesac of Egypt, because the people of Juda made images, high places, and groves, &c. and because they suffered Sodomites in the Land. Jeroboam was punished in himselfe and his posteritie, for the golden Calves that hee erected. Joram had all his sonnes slain by the Philistims, and his very bowels torn out of his body by an excoriating flix, for murthering his brethren. Ahab and Jezabel were slain, the bloud of the one, the body of the other eaten with dogges, for the false accusing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same, and 2 Sam. 21. 1.

the like sinnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the same famine, plagues, warre, losse, vexation, death, sickneſſe, and calamities; howsoever the wise men of the world raise these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents, which, as being next their eyes and ears, seem to them to work every alteration that happeneth.

§. IV.

Of Asa and his Contemporaries.

2 Chron. 14. TO Abijah succeeded Asa, who enjoyed peace for his first ten years, in which time hee establiſhed the Church of God, breaking down the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting down their groves, and taking away their high places. He also spared not his own mother, who was an Idolatresse,
2 Chro. 15.16 but deposing her from her regency, brake her Idoll, stampt it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities, and other places, providing (as provident Kings do) for the troubles of war in the leasure of peace. For not long after hee was invaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Judæa, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never assembled of that
2 Chro. 14.9. Nation, either before or since: For it is written, that there came against the Judæans, Zerah of Æthiopia, with an hoste of ten hundred thousand, and three hundred Chariots, which Asa encountred with an Armie of five hundred and fourscore thousand levied out of those two Tribes of Juda and Benjamin, which obeyed him, and with which hee overthrew this fearfull multitude, and had the spoile both of their Cities and Campes.

In the former book, c. 4. §. 14. item, c. 8. §. 10. & 6. That this Zerah was not an Æthiopian, I have * proved already, and were it but the length between Æthiopia and Judæa, and the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt interjacent (who would not suffer a million of strangers to pass through them) it were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is, that these invaders were Æthiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoiled by the Judæans, in following their victory, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all men know that Gerar standeth upon the torrent of Besor, which David past over when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this proveth sufficiently, that Zerah was leader of the Arabians, and that Gerar was a frontier town stan-
2 Chron. 14. ding on the uttermost South-border of all Judæa, from all parts of Æthiopia six hundred miles. Also the spoiles which Asa took, as the cattell, camels, and sheep, whereof he sacrificed five thousand, shew them to be Arabians adjoyning, and not far off, and not unknown Æthiopians. And if it be objected that these desart countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I answer, that it is as like that Arabia Petræa, and the Desart, which compasse two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two Tribes of the twelve, should arm five hundred and fourscore thousand. Besides, it answereth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these Nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Ismael, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelve Princes, &c.

Baasha a King of Israel began to reign in the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnes of Asa after his great victory, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, 2 Chro. 16.v.1. to joyn with him against Asa; and to the end to block him up, he fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Jerusalem toward Samaria.

This war began according to the letter of the Scriptures in the 36. year of Asa his reign: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. year of Asa; therfore could not Baasha begin this war in the 35. of Asa his reign, but in the 35. year of the division of Juda & Israel; for so many years it was from the first of Roboam, who reigned 17. years, to the 16. of Asa. It may seem strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Army of five hundred & fourscore thousand good Souldiers, did not easily drive away Baasha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Jeroboam, and of Asa himself against Zerah, being yet fresh in mind, which might well have emboldened the men of Juda, and asmuch dishartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the Text, which caused Asa to fight at this time with money. It may be that the imployment of so many hundred thousands of hands, in the late service against Zerah, had caused many mens private businesses to lye undispatched, whereby the people being now intentive to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be unwilling to stir against the Israelites, choosing rather to wink at apparent inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring upon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might have deterred Asa from adventuring himself with the least part of his forces, & committing the success into the hands of God. Howsoever it were, he took the treasures remaining in the temple, with which he waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose employments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacy with Baasha. For the Israelites were his borderers and next neighbours, whom neither himself (after his invasion) nor his successors after him ever gave over, till they had made themselves masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nepthalim, without resistance, hee spoyled divers principall Cities thereof, and inforced Baasha to quit Rama, and to leave the same to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same: which done, Benhadad, who loved neither party, being loden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Juda, returned to Damascus. After this, when Hanani the Prophet reprehended Asa, in that he now relyed on the strength of Syria, and did not rest himself on the favour and assistance of God, he not only caused Hanani to be imprisoned, but he began to burden and oppresse his people, and was therefore strucken with the grievous paines of the gout in his feet, wherewith after he had been two years continually tormented, he gave up the ghost when he had reigned 41. years. 2 Chron. 16. 4. 1 King. 15. 2 Chron. 16.

There lived with Asa, Agesilaus the sixt of the Heraclida, and Bacis the fift King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacida. Astartus, and Asarimus were Kings in Tyre. Asarimus took revenge on his brother Phelletes, for the murther of Ithobalus Priest of the goddesse Astarta, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Atys and Capys ruled the Latines: Pirithiades and Ophrateus the Assyrians: Tersippus and Pherbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Egypt; who dying in the 36. year of Asa, left Cheops his successour, that reigned fifty six years, even to the 16. of Josaphat. §. V.

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the reign of Asa.

IN the reign of Asa the Kingdome of Israel felt great and violent commotions, which might have reduced the ten Tribes unto their former allegeance to the house of David, if the wisedome of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Jeroboam had, in his latter dayes, the sentence of heavie vengeance laid upon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Israel, for the sinne of Salomon, and his reign over the ten Tribes. One son Jeroboam had among others, in whom onely God found so much piety, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family) it procured unto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples love, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was most happy) the favourable approbation of God himself.

After the losse of this good son, the ungodly father was soon taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile unthankfulnesse to God, that hee durst not suffer his own name to be used in consulting with an holy Prophet, assured of the ruine hanging over him and his, yea of Gods extreme hatred; yet forbearing to destroy those accursed Idols that wrought his confusion. So loath he was to forsake his worldly wisedome, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memory excepted.

Nadab the son of Jeroboam, reigned in the second and third years of Asa, which are reckoned as two years, though indeed his fathers last year of two and twenty did run along (how farre is uncertain) with the second of Asa, whose third year was the first of Baasha, so that perhaps this Nadab enjoyed not his Kingdome one whole year. Hee did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sentence. It seems that Hee little feared the judgements denounced against his fathers house: for as a Prince that 1 King. 15. 25.

was secure of his own estate, he armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Towns. There (whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to mind their grievous losse of five hundred thousand under Jeroboam, counting it an unluckie family to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, he exasperated them) slain he was by Baasha, whom the Army did willingly accept for King in his stead. Baasha was no sooner proclaimed King, than hee began to take order with the house of Jeroboam, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercy, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods will to have it so, it is evident by his continuing in the same form of Idolatry which Jeroboam had begun. Wherefore he received the same sentence from God that had been laid upon Jeroboam; which was executed upon him also in the same sort. He began to infest Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did wast his Countrie, destroying all the Land of Nepthalim. Four and twenty years he reigned, and then dying, left the Crown to Ela his son; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the son of Jeroboam had done, two years current, perhaps not one compleet.

Ela was as much an Idolater as his father: and withall a riotous person. Hee sent an Army against Gibbethon, the same town of the Philistims, before which Nadab the son of Jeroboam perished; but he sate at home the whilest, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby he gave such advantage against himself, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaviour so contemptible, conceived hope of the like fortune as Baasha had found, by doing as Baasha had done. Wherefore he did set upon Ela in his drunkennesse, and slew him. Presently upon which fact, he stiled himself King of Israel: and began his reign with massacring all the house of Baasha; extending his cruelty not onely to his children, and kinsfolk, but unto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blown to the Camp at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in stead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitor: and being led by Omri, whom they saluted King, they (quitting the siege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in short space they may seem to have forced. Zimri wanting strength to defend the City, not courage to keep himself from falling alive into his enemies hands, did set fire on the Palace, consuming it and himself together to ashes. Seven dayes he is said to have reigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Camp. For Zimri was also 1 King. 16. 19. an Idolater, Walking in the way of Jeroboam; and therefore is likely to have had more time wherein to declare himself, than the reign of seven dayes, and those consumed partly in murthering the friends of Baasha, partly in seeking to have defended his own life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri; whereby it may seem, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set up a new head, who doubtlesse would never have appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, some strength, not unlikely to resist and vanquish the Army which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not find; onely it appears that his side was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

§. VI.

A conjecture of the causes hindering the re-union of Israel with Juda, which might have been effected by these troubles.

ANy man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may justly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wearied with the calamities already suffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present civill warres, did not return to their ancient Kings, and re-unite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Juda and Benjamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in Asa, but rather chose the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yeelding, or burning himself, the other to languish away, as a man forsaken, than to have recourse unto a remedy, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that GOD was pleased to have it so, were a true, but an idle answer (for his secret will is the cause of all things) unlesse it could be proved, that he had forbidden Asa to deal in that businesse, as he forbad Reboboam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the restraint laid by God upon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appears by the Warre continued between Israel and Juda, so many yeers following; wherein Abia so farre prevailed, that he wan a great battail, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which hee annexed to his own Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly look into the second causes, moving the People and Leaders of the ten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new upstarts, rather than to cast their eyes upon that Royall house of David, from which the succession of five Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have beene laid upon the mean beginnings thereof. To think that Omri had prevented his Competitors in making peace with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him; which as it might serve alone to prove, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which he professed to take at the very first, of revenging the massacre committed upon the family and friends of Baasha, (Asa his mortal enemy) gives manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more justly than he have expected the friendship of Juda in that quarrel. Wherefore in searching out the reason of this backwardnes in the ten Tribes (which was such, that they may seeme to have never thought upon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes; it were not amiss to examine the causes moving the people to revenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard rather than of Nadab the son of Jeroboam, who followed the wars in person as a man of spirit & courage. Surely it is apparent, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if we look upon humane reason) occasioned by desire of breaking that heavie yoke of bondage, wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their desire was to have a King that should not oppresse them; not to have no King at all. And therfore when the arrogant follie of Reboboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediatly choose Jeroboam in his stead, as a man likely to afford that liberty unto them, for which he had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deceived. For his affectation of popularity appears in his building of decayed Towers, and in the institution of his new devised Idolatry, where he told the people, that it was too much for them to travaile so far as to Jerusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntary, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reign, and in the reign of his son, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtesie of the people; or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King, that hee still retained in his own hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens, it is cleerly apparent, that the whole army of all Israel joyned with Baasha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and eradication of Jeroboams house.

1. King. 16. 25

Now the reign of Baasha himself, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) every way unfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdom harried by the Syrians; neither did he win that one town of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that businesse to his son, who likewise appeares an unprofitable sluggard. Wherefore it must needs bee, that the favour of the people toward the house of Baasha grew from his good forme of Civill government, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Jeroboam ever meant to doe. And surely he that shall take pains to look into those examples which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Juda, in administration of justice, will finde it most probable, that upon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so averse from the line of David, as to thinke all adversity more tolerable, than the weighty Scepter of that house. For the death of Joab and Shimei was indeed by them deserved; yet in that they suffered it without forme of judgement, they suffered like unto men innocent. The death of Adonijah was both without judgement, and without any crime objected, other than the Kings jealousie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrary justice (under which it may bee supposed that many were cast away) hee would have slaine Jeroboam (if hee could have caught him) before he had yet committed any offence; as appeares by his confident returne out of Egypt, like one that was knowne to have endured wrong, having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, Jehoram did upon his brethren, & upon sundry of his greatest men; as also Joash did so put to death Zacharias the son of Jehojada, who had made him King, even in the court of the house of the Lord: and Manasses did shed innocent bloud exceeding much, till he replenished Jerusalem from corner to corner: and this was imputed to him as another fault; besides his sinne, wherewith he made Juda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the Kings of Israel we find no monument of such arbitrary proceeding, unlesse perhaps the words of Jehoram the sonne of Ahab (which were but words) may be taken for an instance, when he said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of Elisha the sonne of Shaphat shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plain whether hee meant to kill him without more adoe, or to have him condemned as a false Prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were fain to eat their own children; which he thought a sufficient argument to prove, that it was not Gods purpose to deliver them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the liberty which the Israelites enjoyed, than any peremptory execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not feare to stand upon his own right, though Ahab were even sicke for anger; neither was he for that cause put to death, as upon commandement, but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a judiciall forme, which might give satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

The murther of the Prophets is continually ascribed to Jezabel, an impudent woman, and not unto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their lives were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people being Idolaters, were both pleased with their death, & laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Juda (such as are registred) prove them to use a more absolute maner of command, than the Kings of the ten Tribes. Neither doe their sufferings witnesse the contrary. For of those which reigned over Juda, from the division of the Kingdome, to the captivity of the ten Tribes, three were slaine by the people, and two were denied a buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Ahazia and his brethren, slaine by Jehu, with the destruction of all that Royall seed of Athalia, did not (for ought that we can read) stirre up in the people any such thirst of revenge, as might by the suddennesse and uniformity testifie the affection to bee generall, and proceeding from a loving remembrance of their Princes: unlesse we should think that the death of Athalia, after seven yeeres reign, were occasioned rather by the memory of her ill purchasing, than by the present sense of her tyrannicall abusing the government, whereon she had seised. On the other side, such of the Kings of Israel as perished by treason (which were seven of the twenty) were all slain by conspiracie of the great men, who aspired by treason to the Crown: the people being so far from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Soveraignes, that (after Nadab) they did never forbeare to revenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approve the good successe of treason, unlesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly revenged upon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, upon Zimri and Shallum, who traiterously got and usurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the seven remain, whose ends how the people took, it may be doubtfull. Though indeed it is precisely said of the slaughter committed on Ahabs children by Jehu, that the people durst not fight with him that did it, because they were exceedingly affraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed over. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of them perished by fury of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them; neither was there any motive urging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainly (howsoever all that the Law cals treason, bee interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings destruction) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it selfe with the bloud of some great Officers; no such rebellions, howsoever wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their naturall Soveraigne, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten upon his Royall person: which if any man impute unto grosse ignorance, another may more charitably, and I think, more truely, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who, being looſened by Pallas, did with his 100. hands give aſſiſtance to Jupiter, when all the reſt of the gods conſpired againſt him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as ſignifying that Monarches need not to feare any curbing of their abſoluteneſs by mighty ſubjects, as long as by wiſedome they keep the hearts of the people, who will bee ſure to come in on their ſide. Though indeed the Storie might very well have borne the ſame interpretation, as it is rehearſed by Homer, who tells us that Pallas was one of the conſpiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by looſening Briareus. For a good forme of government ſufficeth by it ſelfe to retaine the people, not onely without aſſiſtance of a laborious Wit, but even againſt all devices of the greateſt and ſhrewdeſt Politicians: every Sheriffe and Conſtable, being ſooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any over-weening Rebell, how mighty ſoever, can againſt him.

This declaration of the peoples love, being ſeldome found in Juda, makes it very likely, that the rule it ſelfe of government there was ſuch, as neither gave occaſion of contentment unto the ſubjects, nor of confidence in their good affection to the Kings. Upon which reaſons it may ſeem that the multitude was kept uſually diſarmed. For otherwiſe it would have beene almoſt impoſſible, that Athalia the ſiſter of Ahab, a ſtranger to the Royall bloud of Juda, ſhould by the onely authority of a Queene-mother have deſtroyed all the ſeed of David, and uſurped the Kingdome very neere 7. yeeres, without finding any reſiſtance. Yea when Jehojada the high Prieſt had agreed with the Captains and principall men of the Land to ſet up Joaſh their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected, hee was faine to give to theſe Captaines and their men, the ſpears and the ſhields that were King Davids, & were in the houſe of the Lord. But we need not enter into ſuch particulars. Queſtionleſſe, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their duty toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their own choice or admiſſion, holding the Crowne by a more uncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reaſon, why the ten Tribes did never ſeeke to returne to their ancient Lords: but after the deſtruction of their ſixe firſt Kings, which died in the reigne of Aſa, admitted a ſeventh of a new family, rather than they would conſubject themſelves with thoſe of Juda and Benjamin, under a more honourable, but more heavie yoke.

So Aſa having ſeen the death of 7. Kings of Iſrael, died himſelfe after one and fortie yeeres reigne, leaving Jehoſaphat his ſonne to deale with Ahab the ſonne of Omri, who was the eighth King over the ten Tribes.

Of Jehoſaphat and his contemporaries.

Jehoſaphat, who ſucceeded Aſa, was a Prince religious and happy; hee deſtroyed all the Groves, Altars, and high places dedicated to Idolatry, and ſent teachers to all places and people wanting inſtruction; he recovered the tribute due unto him by the Arabians and Philiſtims: from the one he had ſilver, from the other ſheepe & goates to the number of fifteene thouſand & foure hundred. The numbers of men of war were more than admirable; for it is written that Adnah had the command of three hundred thouſand, Jehohanam of two hundred and foureſcore thouſand, and Amaſia of two hundred thouſand; alſo that he had, beſides theſe in Benjamin, of thoſe that bare ſhields, which we call Targetiers, and of Archers under Eliada, two hundred thouſand, & under the commandement of Jehozabad a hundred and foureſcore thouſand: which numbred together make eleven hundred and ſixty thouſand, all which are ſaid to have waited upon the King; beſides his garriſons. 2 Chron. 17.

That Juda & Benjamin, a territory not much exceeding the Countie of Kent, ſhould muſter eleven hundred and ſixtie thouſand fighting men, is very ſtrange, & the number farre greater than it was found upon any other view. Joab in Davids time found five hundred thouſand: Rehoboam found but an hundred and foureſcore thouſand: Abia foure hundred and eight thouſand: Aſa five hundred and foureſcore thouſand: Amazia inrolled all that could beare arms, & they amounted to three hundred thouſand. Surely, 2 Sam. 24. 4.

whereas it is written that when news was brought to Jehosaphat that Moab & Ammon were entred his territory to the West of Jordan, and that their numbers were many, he feared (to wit) the multitude; it is not likely that he would have feared even the army of Xerxes, if he could have brought into the field 11. hundred and 60. thousand fighting men, leaving all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my self to better judgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the 17. distributed to severall Leaders, were not all at one time, but that the 300. thousand under Adnah, and the 200. and fourescore thousand under Jehohanam, were afterward commanded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliada, and Jehosabad: for the grosse & totall is not in that place set downe, as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Againe, as the aides which Jehosaphat brought to Ahab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinary power, so the Moabites & Ammonites which he feared, could never make the one halfe of those numbers, which he that commanded least among Jehosaphats Leaders had under him.

This mighty Prince, notwithstanding his greatnesse, yet he joyned in friendship with Ahab King of Israel, who had married that wicked woman Jezabel. Him Jehosaphat visited at Samaria, and caused his son Joram to marry Athalia, this Achabs daughter.

Ahab perswaded Jehosaphat to assist him in the Warre against the Syrians, who held the City of Ramoth Gilead from him, & called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites, to foretell the successe; who promised him victory. But Jehosaphat believed nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Hereupon Achab made answer, that he had one called Michaiah, but he hated that Prophet, because he alwayes foretold of evill, and never of any good towards him. Yet Michaiah was sent for to the King, but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets, and to promise victory unto them, as they did. But Michaiah spake the truth, and repeated his vision to both the Kings, which was, that God asked who shall perswade Ahab, that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his Prophets, & be in them a false spirit to delude. For as it is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini, sed spiritus patris vestri loquitur in vobis: It is not you that speake, but the Spirit of your Father speakes in you: so in a contrary kinde did the devill in the Prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his destruction. And as P. Martyr upon this place well observeth, these evill spirits are ministers of Gods vengeance, & are used as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime imploy. For as it pleaseth God by his good Angels, to save & deliver from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the contrary, it is by the evill that hee punisheth and destroyeth; both which are said to performe the will of their Creator, licet non eodem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembreth a second sort of malignant natures, but they are every-where visible. There are spirits, saith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigour lay on sure strokes. In the time of destruction they shew forth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias having by this his revelation greatly displeased the King, & the Prophets, whose spirit he discovered, was stroken by Zidkiah one of Baals Prophets, and by Achab himselfe committed to prison: where hee appointed him to bee reserved and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiah, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returne in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by mee. Nevertheless Achab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Jehosaphat returned to Jerusalem, where he was reprehended by Jehu the Prophet for assisting an idolatrous Prince, and 2 Chron. 18. one that hated God.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, joyned with the Moabites, Ammonites & Idumeans to invade Iudea: who passe Jordan & encamp at Engaddi, & when Jehosaphat gathered his army, the prophet Jahaziel fortold him of the victory, which should be obtained without any bloud-shed of his part: & so when Jehosaphat approached, this assembly of Nations, the Ammonites & Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumeans, & quarrelling for some causes among themselves, those of Ammon & Moab set upon the Idumeans, &
2 Chron. 20. brake them utterly: which done, they also invaded each other, in which broil Jehosaphat arriving, took the spoile of them all without any loss of his part, as it was foretold & promised misled by God. Notwithstanding this victory, Iehosaphat, forgetting that he was formerly reprehended for assisting an Idolatrous King, did notwithstanding joyn with Ochazias, the son of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like return which Salomon had: but as Eleizer the Prophet foretold him, his ships perished, and were broken in the port of Ezion Gaber, and so that enterprize was overthrown. 2 Chron. 20.

Yet he taketh part with Iehoram, the brother of Ochozias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Iuda and Israel, the Edomites joyn their forces, not forgetting, it seems, that the Moabites, assisted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed their army.

The Moabites, subjects to David and Salomon, forsaking the Kings of Iuda, gave themselves for vassals to Ieroboam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Iehosaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatry of his Colleague, yet as it seemeth he was drawn into this war, both to be avenged of the Moabites for their defection from Iuda to Israel, as also because they had lately joyned themselves with the Syrians against Iosaphat, and thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forsook Iuda, & now Israel.

Both Kings resolved to passe by the way of Idumæa, thereby the better to assure that Nation; for we find that both Moab, Ammon and Edom were all in the field together at Engaddi against Iehosaphat: But whether they had then declared themselves against Iehosaphat, it is not certain; for in the 2. of Chron. 11. vers. 8. it is written, that in the time of Ioram the son of Iehosaphat, Edom rebelled: and therefore it seemeth to me that the Edomites, when they were slain by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to return from them, and to joyn themselves with the army of Iuda. For, that they were numbred among the enemies of Iehosaphat, it is plain in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plain c. 21. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Iehosaphats death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinary heat of the year, or whether the Idumeans having a purpose to rebell, misled the army of Iuda and Israel, with intent to infeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Crassus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had in all likelihood utterly perished, had not Elisha taught them to cut trenches whereinto the water sprang, by which not onely Iehosaphat and his army, but Ieboram King of Israel an Idolater was relieved: the great mercy and goodnes of God having ever been prone to save the evill for the good, whereas he never destroyed the good for the evill.

The miserable issue of this warre, and how Moab burnt his son, or the son of the King of Edom, for sacrifice, on the rampire of his own City, I have already written in the life of Ioram among the Kings of Israel. Iehosphat reigned 25. years and died; he was buried in the valley of Iehosaphat, and a part of the Pyramis set over his grave is yet to be seen, saith Brocard. His acts are written at large by Iehu the son of Hanani. 2 King. 3. 2 Chron. 20. Brocard. sanct.

There lived with Iehosaphat, Ophratenes in Assyria, Capetus, and Tiberinus Kings of the Albans in Italy, of the latter the river Tiber (formerly Albula) took name.

In Iehosaphats time also ruled Metades or Mezades in Athens: Agelas or Agesilaus in Corinth, and Archilaus of the same race, of the Heraclidæ the seventh in Lacedæmon. Badesarus ruled the Tyrians; Achab, Ochazias and Ioram the Israelites.

CHAP. XX.

Of Iehoram the sonne of Iehosaphat, and Ahazia.

That Iehoram was made King sundry times.

IEHORAM the Son of Iehosaphat King of Iuda began to reign at thirty two years of age, and lived untill hee was forty years old, being eight years a King: but of these eight years, which Iehoram is said to have reigned, four are to be reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Achab, left this Iehoram King in his stead, as Achab did his son Ahazia. This appears by the severall beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two Iehorams Kings of Israel and Iuda, and to Ahazia the eldest son of Ahab. For Ahazia is 1 King. 22. v. 51.

said to have begun his reign, in the seventeenth year of Jehosaphat: Jehoram the brother
2 King. 1. 17. of Ahazia succeeded him in the 2. year of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda,
2 King. 3. v. 1. and 9. that is, in the next year after that Jehoram of Juda was designed King by his father; it being (as we find elsewhere) the eighteenth year of Jehosaphat himself, who went with the Israelites against Moab. Hereby it appears that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained still by Jehosaphat, who governed absolutely by himself, not
2 King. 8. 16. communicating the rule with his son. But in the fifth year of Jehoram King of Israel, which was the two and twentieth of Jehosaphat, the old King took unto him, as partner in the government, this his eldest son, who was at that time 32. years old, his Father being 57. Now forasmuch as Jehosaphat reigned 25. years, it is evident that his sonne
2 King. 22. 42. did not reign alone till the eighth of Joram King of Israel. The like regard is to be had in accounting the times of other Kings of Juda & Israel, who did not alwayes reign precisely so long as the bare letter of the Text may seem at first to affirm: but their years were sometimes compleat, sometimes onely current, sometimes confounded with the years of their successors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the years of those others, with whom they did begin and end.

It were perhaps a thing lesse needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons moving Jehosaphat either to assume unto him his son as partner in the Kingdome, whilest hee was able himself to command both in peace and in warre, the like having never been done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the 17. of his reign) vouchsafed unto him that honour, to resume it unto himself, or at least wise to deferre the confirmation of it, untill four or five years were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a mean to find some light, whereby we may more clearly discover the causes of much extraordinary businesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such conjecture, as the circumstances of the Story briefly handled in the Scriptures may seem to approve.

We are therefore to consider, that this King Jehosaphat was the first of Rehoboams issue that ever entred into any streight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Juda before him, had with much labour and long war, tired themselves in vain, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Jehosaphat thought it the wisest way, to make a league offensive and defensive between Israel and Juda, whereby each might enjoy their own in quiet.

2 Chro. 19. v. 2. and 3. This confederacy made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true root and fountain of all wisedome: yet as a piece of sound policy, doubtlesse it wanted not fair pretences of much common good thereby likely to arise, with mutuall fortification of both those Kingdoms against the uncircumcised Nations their ancient enemies. This apparent benefit, being so inestimable a jewell, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditary from father to son, it was thought a very good course to have it confirmed by some sure bond of affinity, and thereupon was Athalia the daughter of Ombri, and sister of Ahab King of Israel, given in marriage to Jehoram, who was son and heir apparent to the King of Juda. This Lady was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queen Jezabel her brothers wife, that she durst undertake, and could throughly perform a great deal more in Jerusalem, than the other knew how to compasse in Samaria. Shee was indeed a fire-brand ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Juda, and perhaps of those men or their children, whose worldly wisedome, regardlesse of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian war at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Juda and Israel did adventure equally, but the profit of the victory should have redounded wholly to Ahab: as godly Princes very seldome thrive by marching with Idolaters, but rather serve the turns of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himself, cannot be well affected to his servants. Before their setting forth, Ahab designed his King, his son Ahaziah; not so much perhaps in regard of the uncertain events of war (for none of his predecessors had ever done the like, upon the like occasions) not as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Michaia (for he despised them) as inviting Jehosaphat by his own example, to take the same course, wherein he prevailed.

§. II.

Probable conjectures of the motives inducing the old King Jehoſophat to change his purpoſe often, in making his ſon Jehoram King.

MAny arguments do very ſtrongly prove Jehoram to have been wholly over-ruled by his wife, eſpecially for his forſaking the religion of his godly Anceſtors, and following the abominable ſuperſtitions of the houſe of Achab.

That ſhe was a woman of intollerable pride, and abhorring to live a private life, the whole courſe of her actions witneſſeth at large. Much vain matter ſhe was able to produce, whereby to make her husband think that his brethren and kindred were but mean and unworthy perſons in compariſon of him, and of his children, which were begotten upon the daughter and ſiſter of two great Kings, not upon baſe women, and meer ſubjects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained againſt the Syrian Benhadad, were matter ſufficient to make an inſolent man think highly of himſelf, as being allied ſo honourably; who could otherwiſe have found in his heart well enough, to deſpiſe all his brethren, as being the eldeſt, and heir apparent to the Crown, whereof already he had, in a manner, the poſſeſſion.

How ſoon his vices brake out, or how long hee diſſembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainly be known. Like enough it is, that ſome ſmoke, out of the hidden fire, did very ſoon make his fathers eyes to water; who thereupon cauſed the young man to know himſelf better, by making him fall back into rank among his younger brethren. And ſurely the doings of Jehoſaphat about the ſame time, argue no ſmall diſtemper of the whole country, through the miſgovernment of his ungodly ſon. For the good King was fain to make his progreſſe round about the Land, reclaiming the people unto the ſervice of God, and appointing Judges throughout all the ſtrong Cities of Juda Citie by Citie. This had been a needleſſe labour, if the religion taught and ſtrongly maintained by Aſa, and by himſelf, had not ſuffered alteration, and the courſe of Juſtice been perverted, by the power of ſuch as had born authority. But the neceſſitie that then was of reformation, appears by the charge which the King did give to the Judges; and by his commiſſion given to one of the Prieſts in ſpirituall cauſes, and to the Steward of his houſe in temporall matters, to be generall over-ſeers. 2 Chro. 19. v. 4. 5. & 6.

This was not till after the death of Ahazia the ſon of Ahab; but how long after it is uncertain. For Jehoram the brother of Ahazia began his reign (as hath been already noted) in the eighteenth of Jehoſaphat, which was then accounted the ſecond of Jehoram, Jehoſaphats ſon, though afterward this Jehoram of Juda had another firſt and ſecond year, even in his fathers time, before he reigned alone, as the beſt Chronologers and Expoſitors of the holy Text agree. So he continued in private eſtate, untill the two and twentieth of his fathers reign, at which time, though the occaſions inducing his reſtitution to former dignity are not ſet down, yet wee may not think, that motives thereto, appearing ſubſtantiall, were wanting. Jehoram of Iſrael held the ſame correſpondency with Jehoſaphat that his father had done; and made uſe of it. He drew the Judæans into the war of Moab, at which time it might well be, that the young Prince of Juda was again ordained King by his father, as in the Syrian expedition he had been. Or if wee ought rather to think, that the preparations for the enterprize againſt Moab did not occupy ſo much time, as from the eighteenth of Jehoſaphat, in which year that Nation rebelled againſt Iſrael, unto his two and twentieth; yet the daily negotiations between the two Kings of Juda and Iſrael, and the affinity between them contracted in the perſon of Jehoram, might offer ſome good occaſions thereunto. Neither is it certain how the behaviour of the younger ſons, in their elder brothers diſgrace, might cauſe their Father to put him in poſſeſſion for fear of tumult after his death; or the deep diſſimulation of Jehoram himſelf might win the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing uſuall in miſchievous fell natures, to be as abject and ſervile in time of adverſity, as inſolent and bloudy upon advantage. This is manifeſt, that being repoſſeſſed of his former eſtate, he demeaned himſelf in ſuch wiſe toward his brethren, as cauſed their father to enable them, not onely with ſtore of ſilver and gold, and of pretious things, (which kind of liberality other Kings doubtleſſe had uſed unto their younger ſons) but with the cuſtody of ſtrong Cities in Juda, to aſſure them, if it might have been, by unwonted means, againſt unwonted perils. 1 Chron. 21. 3.

§. III. The

§. III.

The doings of Jehoram when hee reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

BUt all this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequell. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the younger sons of Jehosaphat found strong Cities, a weak defence, against the power of him unto whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in upon the summons of a King their brother, then had he them without any more adoo; if they stood upon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so unable to hold out against him, who besides his own power, was able to bring the forces of the Israelitish Kingdome against them; so that the apparent likelihood of their finall overthrow, sufficed to make all forsake them in the very beginning. Howsoever it was, they were all taken and slain, and with them for company many great men of the Land, such belike, as either had taken their part, when the Tyrant sought their lives, or had been appointed Rulers of the Country, when Jehoram was deposed from his Government; in which Office they, without forbearing to do justice, could hardly avoid the doing of many things derogatory to their young Master; which if hee would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durst say the contrary?

After this Jehoram took upon him, as being now Lord alone, to make invasions in Religion, wherein he was not contented, as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and safe conduct unto Superstition and Idolatry, nor to provoke and encourge the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much addicted, having such knowledge of God, and of his detesting that above all other sins; but hee used compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to have set up Irreligion by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what he listed, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and having hitherto, since Davids time, been governed by a Vice-Roy, did now make unto themselves a King. Against these Jehoram in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots; with which he obtained victory in the field, compelling the rebels to flie into their places of advantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honour that he had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom he should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now began the prophecy of Isaac to take effect, wherein he foretold, that Esau in processe of time should break the yoke of Jacob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Juda, but held their own so well, that when, after many civill and forreign wars, the Jewes by sundry Nations had been brought low; Antipater the Edomite, with Herod his son, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the Jewes, in the decrepit age of Israel, and reigned as Kings, even in Jerusalem it self.

The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna, a great City within Juda, which in the time of Joshua had a peculiar King, to rebel against Jehoram, and set it self in liberty. Libna stood in the confines of Benjamin and of Dan, far from the assistance of any bordering enemies to Juda, and therfore so unlikely it was to have maintained it self in liberty, that it may seem strange how it could escape from utter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and throughly incensed Lord. The Israelite held such good intelligence at that time with Juda, that he would not have accepted the Town, had it offered it self unto him: neither doe we read that it sought how to cast it self into a new subjection, but continued a free state. The rebellion of it against Jehoram, was, Because he had forsaken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not only been the first & remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, moving the inhabitants to do as they did: for it was a Town of the Levites; who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion, contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsive authority to force unto it all that were unwilling. As for the use of the Temple at Jerusalem (which, being devout men, they might fear to lose by this rebellion) it was never denied to those of the devoted Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather invited the Israelites thither, and gave them kind entertainment: under Idolaters they must have been without it, whether they lived free, or in subjection. Yet it seems that private reasons were not wanting, which might move them rather to doe than suffer that which was unwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein Jehosaphat reformed his kingdome, the good old King appointing new Governours, and giving them especiall charge to doe justice without respect of persons, used these words; The Levites shall be officers before you; Be of good courage, and doe it, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seems, than he encouraged them against the more powerfull, than just proceedings of his son, whom of the Levites did (according to the trust reposed in them) not let in discharging their duties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feel, as many Princes of the land had done, his heavie indignation. How is happened that Libna was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that we can read) so much as besieged or molested, may justly seem very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Jehosaphat was able to raise, being sufficient to have over-whelmed any one Town, and buried it under the earth, which they might well in one moneth have cast into it with shovels, by ordinarie approaches.

But it seems that of those great numbers which his Father could have levied, there were not many whom Jehoram could well trust; and therefore perhaps he thought it no great losse, to let one Town goe, than to put weapons into their hands, who were more likely to follow the example of Libna, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loved, are faine themselves to stand in fear of those, by whom they might have been dreadfull unto others.

§. IV.

Of the miseries falling upon Jehoram, and of his death.

These afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeasure in the mind of the wicked Prince, a Prophecie in writing was delivered to him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wives, and his own body. Hereby likewise it appears that he was a cruell persecutor of Gods servants; in as much as the Prophets durst not receive him to his face, as they had done many of his predecessors, both good and evil Kings; but were faine to denounce Gods Judgements against him by letters, keeping themselves close and far from him. This Epistle is said to have been sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophesied in his stead before this time, even in the dayes of Jehosaphat. Wherefore it may be that Elias left this prophecie in writing behind him, or that (as some conjecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that we read Elias for Elizeus. Indeed any thing may rather be believed than the Tradition held by some of the Jewish Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, devised by Erasmus, out of the Verse that was sent from heaven to S. Giles. 2 Chro. 21. 12. 2 Kin. 1. & 3. 11.

But whosoever was the Author of this threatning Epistle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible as the sentence. For the Philistims and Arabians brake into Judea, and took the Kings house, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they slew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not presumed since the time of David, to make any offensive warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Towns, maintaining themselves in the rest of their small territories, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibathon by the Israelites. The Arabians were likely to have been then, as they are now, a naked people, all horsemen, and ill appointed; their Countrie affording no other furniture, than such as might make them fitter to rob and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities, such as were thick set in Judea. True it is that in ages long after following, they conquered all the South parts of the world then known, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered, that this was when they had learned of the Romans the Art of Warre; and that the provisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned; in one subdued Province, did make them able and skilfull in pursuing their conquest, and going on into Regions far removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia in self are good horsemen, but ill appointed; very dangerous to passengers, but unable to deal with good Souldiers, as riding stark naked, and rather trusting in the swiftnesse of their horses, than in any other means of resistance, where they are well oppused. And such or little better, may they seem to have bin, that spoyled Iudea in the time of Jehoram. For their Countrie was alwaies barren and desart, wanting manuall Arts, whereby to supply the naturals with furniture; neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may infer, that one half, yea, not one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Iuda and Benjamin under Jehosaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men) had been enough to have driven away farre greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people been unable to deal with them, for lack of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes jealousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the Philistims.

It may seem that the house of the King which these invaders took, was not his Palace in Jerusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrie, where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we read not that they did sack the Citie, or spoyle the Temple, which would have invited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they took Jerusalem it self by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guard too weak to keep them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous: and therefore having done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselves with such purchace as they were able safely to conveigh away.

The slaughter committed by Jehu on the two and fortie brethren of Ahazia, or, (as they are called elsewhere) so many of his brothers sons, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seed perished (only Joas excepted) under the tyrannie of Athalia, following within two years after this invasion of the Philistims and Arabians, make it seem probable, that the sons of Jehoram were not all slain at once, but that rather the first murther began in his own time, and was seconded by many other heavie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly striken, untill it was in a manner quite hewed down.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the body of this wicked King, smiting him with a grievous disease in his bowels, which left him not untill his guts fell out, and his wretched soul departed from his miserable carkasse. The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they not the good manners to pretend sorrow for his death; wherefore hee was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Juda, though his own sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had been his Fathers evill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous interring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintain her own greatnesse, to retain her favourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Son such Counsellours of the house of Ahab, as were fittest for her turn. Wherefore 2. Chro. 24. 4.
she thought it unseasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a stately funerall of a man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed be layd upon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her self and hers, which it now did concern her to avoyd. Such is the qualitie of wicked Instigators, having made greedy use of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his own vices, but with their faults also, the man whose evill inclinations their sinister counsells have made worse, when once he is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Jehoram fel out indeed in a busie time, when his friend and cousin the Israelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramite, and therefore could have had no better leasure to help Athalia, in setting of things according to her own mind, than hee had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to help her husband, when he was distressed by the Philistims; Yea, rather he needed and craved the assistance of the men of Juda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not sped so well the last time, that they should willingly run thither again, unlesse they were very fairly intreated.

The acts of his wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as far as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainly appear, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the revealed will of God, accomplish nevertheless his hidden purpose, and without miraculous means, confound themselves in the seeming-wise devices of their own folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learn to submit their judgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to think, that they may safely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisdome dictateth unto them. For in such kind of unhappy subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Son; but the ill one of them partly hath appeared already, and partly will appear, in that which immediatly followeth.

§. V.

Of the reign of Ahazia, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

Ochazias, or Ahazia, the son of Ieboram and Athalia, began his reign over Iuda, in the twelfth year of Ieboram the son of Ahab King of Israel, and reigned but one year. Touching his age, it is a point of much more difficulty than importance to know it: yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclusion than that of Torniellus, alleging the Edition of the Septuagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which saith that he was twenty years old in the beginning of his kingdom; and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that doe give him two years more. Like enough he is to have been young: for he was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gave him counsell, by which he perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his fathers courses. In matter of State he likewise upheld the league made with the house of Ahab. He was much busied in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Cousin the Israelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wan, but not without blowes: for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Israel was fain to adventure his own person, which escaped not unwounded.

The Town being won, was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to be made by Hazael King of Aram: which done, Ieboram King of Israel with-drew himself to the City of Iezrael, where with more quiet he might attend the curing of his wounds; and Ahazia returned to Ierusalem. It seems that he was but newly come home (for he reigned in all scantly one year, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had taken up a great part,) when he did make a new journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Israel, who lay sore of his wounds. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would have hindered, and therefore sought every occasion to thrust him abroad: for otherwise it was but a vain piece of work so to leave his kingdome, having no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom he had seen yesterday. Certain it is, that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavy judgement, which he had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet upon the house of Ahab. And hereupon at this time had he disposed not only the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seem to have been accidentall, but the very thoughts and affections of such persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one, whose mischievous purposes it will shortly be needfull, for explanation of some difficulties arising, that we diligently consider and examine.

§. VI.

How Ahazia perished with the house of Ahab: and how that Familie was destroyed by Jehu.

THe whole Armie of Israel, with all the principall Captains, lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizeus the Prophet came in among the Captains that were sitting together; who calling out among them Jehu, a principall man, took him apart, and anointed him King over Israel, rehearsing unto him the Prophecie of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him understand that it was the pleasure of God to make him executioner of that sentence. The fashion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captains a desire to know the errand, which Jehu thought meet to let them know, as doubting whether they had over-heard all the talk or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but forth-with proclaimed him king. For the Prophecie of Elias was well known among them, neither durst any one oppose himself against him, that was by God ordained to perform it.

Jehu, who had upon the sudden this great honour thrown upon him, was not slow to put himself in possession of it, but used the first heat of their affections, who joyned with him, in setting on foot the businesse which neerly concerned him, and was not to be fore-slowed, being no more his own than Gods.

The first care taken was that no news of the revolt might be carried to Jezreel, whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being foreseen, he marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King Jehoram was now so well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seems that there was much feasting, and joy made, especially by Queen Jezabel, who kept her state so well, that the brethren of Ahazia, comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to salute the Queen, as to visit the King.

Certain it is, that since the rebellion of Moab against Israel, the house of Ahab did never so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the bloud Royall there were that lived in Samaria; Jehoram the son of Queen Jezabel had won Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vain, with losse of his life; and hee won it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitie was so great between Israel and Juda, that it might suffice to daunt all their common enemies, leaving no hope of successe to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecie of Elias might be forgotten, or no otherwise remembred, than as an unlikely tale by them that beheld the majesticall face of the Court, wherein so great a friend as the King of Juda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

In the middest of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either consulting about prosecution of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Moab, Edom, and other rebels and enemies: or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already atchieved, and the Queen-mother dressing her self in the bravest manner to come down amongst them; tidings were brought in, that the watchman had from a Tower discovered a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to be readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to be discharged upon some notice taken that the enemie would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King sent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Jehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might be. The seeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answer, might argue the matter to be of small importance: yet the King to be satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and hee was likewise detained by Jehu. These dumb shewes bred some suspition in Jehoram, whom the watchman certified of all that happened. And now the companie drew so neer, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Jehu himself by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weaknesse, caused his Chariot to be made ready, and issued forth with Ahazia King of Juda in his companie, company, whose presence added majesty to his train, when strength to resist, or expedition to flee, had bin more needfull. This could not be done so hastily, but that Jehu was come even to the towns end, & there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Jehoram began to salute Jehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answer, his heart failed him, so that crying out upon the treason to his fellow king, he turned away to have fled. But Jehu soon overtook him with an arrow, wherewith he strook him dead, and threw his carkasse into that field, which, purchased with the bloud of the rightfull owner, was to be watered with the bloud of the unjust possessor. Neither did Ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize upon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where Jezabel might soon be advertised of this calamitie, if she did not with her own eyes behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose judgement, pronounced against her long before, had overtaken her, when she least expected it. But she, full of indignation and proud thoughts, made her self ready in all haste, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious looks to daunt the Traitor, or at least to utter some Apophthegme that should expresse her brave spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for ever. Little did she think upon the hungry dogs that were ordained to devour her, whose paunches the stibium, with which she besmeared her eyes, would more offend, than the scolding language wherewith she armed her tongue could trouble the ears of him that had her in his power. As Jehu drew neer, she opened her window, & looking out upon him, began to put him in mind of Zimri, that had not long enjoyed the fruits of his treason, and murther of the King his Master. This was in meer humane valuation stoutly spoken, but was indeed a part of miserable folly; as are all things, howsoever laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Lord of all. Her own Eunuches that stood by and heard her, were not affected so much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Jehu saw that she did use the little remainder of her life in seeking to vex him, hee made her presently to understand her own estate, by deeds and not by words. He only called to her servants to know which of them would be on his side, and soon found them ready to offer their service before the very face of their proud Lady. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her down head-long: which immediatly they performed, without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein she had a few hours before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that considered not the judgements of God that had been denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her own servants, at the commandement of her greatest enemie, that was yesterday her subject, but now her Lord: and she perished miserably, strugling in vain with base groomes, who coutumeliously did hale and thrust her, whilest her insulting enemy sate on Horse-back, adding indignitie to her griefe by scornfull beholding the shamefull manner of her fall, and trampling her body under foot. Her dead carkasse that was left without the walls, was devoured by dogs, and her very memorie was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murther, and oppression, with slow, but sure paiment, and full interest.

Ahazia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehu, was over-taken by the way where he lurked; and receiving his deadly wound in the kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seek his buriall in his own kingdome: and this favour he obtained for his grand-fathers sake, not for his fathers nor his own. He died at Mgiddo, and was thence carried to Jerusalem, where he was enterred with his Ancestors, having reigned about one year.

CHAP. XXI.

Of Athalia; and whose son he was that succeeded her.

§. I.

Of Athalia's usurping the Kingdome, and what pretences she might forge.

2 Chron. 22. 9

AFter the death of Ahazia, it is sayd that his house was not able to retain the Kingdome: which Note, and the proceedings of Athalia upon the death of her son, have given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Joas, who reigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her son, under whose name she had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold upon all the Princes of the bloud, and slew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her self, and reign as Queen, rather than live a Subject. She had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsellors unto her son, such as were fittest for her purpose, and ready at all times to execute her will: that she kept a strong guard about her, it is very likely; and as likely it is that the great execution done by Jehoram, upon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearfull to stir, whatsoever they saw or heard.

Yet ambition, how violent soever it be, is seldome or never so shameless as to refuse the commoditie of goodly pretences offering themselves; but rather scrapes together all that will any way serve to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not absurd for us to think, that Athalia, when she saw the Princes of the Royall bloud, all of them in a maner, slain by her husband, and afterwards his own children destroyed by the Philistims, began even then to play her own game, reducing by artificiall practice, into fair likelihoods, those possibilities wherewith her husbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great shew of reason, either by her own mouth, or by some trustie creature of hers, might she give him to understand, how needful it were to take the best order whilst as yet he might, for fear of the worst that might happen. If the issue of David, which now remained only in his Familie, should by any accident fail (as wofull experience had already shewed what might after come to passe) the people of Juda were not unlikely to choose a King of some new stock, a popular seditious man peradventure, one that to countenance his own unworthinesse, would not care what aspersions he layd upon that Royall house, which was fallen down. And who could assure him, that some ambitious spirit, fore-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not already contrive the destruction of him, and all his seed? Wherefore it were the wisest way to design by his authoritie not only his successour, but also the reversioner, and so to provide, that the Crown might never be subject to any rifling, but remain in the disposition of them that loved him best, if the worst that might be feared comming to passe, his own posteritie could not retain it.

Such perswasions being urged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that governed his affections, were able to make the jealous Tyrant think, that the onely way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heir the last and youngest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queen-Mother, to uphold the first and eldest.

If Athalia took no such course as this in her husbands time, yet might she do it in her sons. For Ahazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his half-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his own-born-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischievous woman forgat her self so far in her wicked policie, that she lost all opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and son did afford, of procuring unto her self some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards feign some such matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would ask to see her evidence, for fear of being sent to learn the certaintie of her son or husband in another World. But I rather think that shee took order for for her affairs before-hand. For though she had no reason to suspect or fear the sudden death of her son, yet it was the wisest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilest her husbands issue by other women was young and unable to resist. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahazia, to the number of two and forty, were sent to the Court of Israel, only to salute the children of the King, and the children of the Queen. The slender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stock of Jehoram that could be grown to any strength) makes it very suspicious, that their entertainment in Jezabels house would onely have been more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Jehu. He that looks into the courses held both before and after by these two Queens, will find cause enough to think no lesse. Of such as have aspired unto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heirs by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples: and the rule of Salomon is true: Is there any thing whereof one may say, Behold, this is new? It hath been already in the old time that was before us. That a King might shed his brothers bloud, was proved by Salomon upon Adonia; that hee might alien the Crown from his naturall Heirs, David had given proof; but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will neglect the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willing by shewing what they may do, than acknowledging why Salomon slew his brother that had begun one rebellion, & was entring into another. Jehoram slew all his brethren, which were better than he: David purchased the kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed: if Jehoram, who had lost much and gotten nothing, thought that he might alien the remainder at his pleasure; or if Ahazia sought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their issue; either of these was to be answered with the words which Jehojada the Priest used afterwards, in declaring the title of Joash: Behold, the Kings son must reign; as the Lord hath said of the sons of David. Wherefore though I hold it very probable, that Athalia did pretend some title, whatsoever it might be, to the Crown of Juda; yet it is most certain that she had thereunto no right at all, but only got it by treacherie, murder, and open violence; and so she held it six whole years, and a part of the seventh, in good seeming securitie.

How Jehu spent his time in Israel, so that hee could not molest Athalia.

IN all this time Jehu did never go about to disturb her; which in reason he was likely to desire, being an enemie to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himself, rooting out the posteritie of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in wars against the Aramites, wherein hee was so far overcharged, that hardly he could retain his own, much lesse attempt upon others. Of the line of Ahab there were seventie living in Samaria, out of which number Jehu by letter advised the Citizens to set up some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident he was; which they well understood to proceed from greater power about him, than they could gather to resist him. Wherefore they took example by the two Kings whom he had slain, and being exceedingly affraid of him, they offered him their service; wherein they so readily shewed themselves obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they sent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were injoyned by a second letter from him. After this he surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, feigning a great sacrifice to their god, by which means he drew them altogether into one Temple, where hee slew them: and in the same zeal to God utterly demolished all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie devised by Jeroboam, no King of Israel had ever greater reason than Jehu to destroy it. For he needed not to fear lest the people should be allured unto the house of David, it was (in appearance) quite rooted up, and the Crown of Juda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had received his kingdom by the unexpected grace of God; and further in regard of his zeal expressed in destroying Baal out of Israel, he was promised, notwithstanding his following the sin of Jeroboam, that the kingdome should remain in his Familie to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serve; he would needs help to piece out Gods providence with his own circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamester, who by stealing a needlesse Card to assure himself of winning a stake, forfeits his whole test. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the use of a superstition, so long practised as was that Idolatrie of Jeroboam. Yet all these, how many soever they were, had never once thought upon making him King, if God, whom (to retain them) he now forsook, had not given him the Crown, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the means of holding it.

This ingratitude of Jehu drew terrible vengeance of God upon Israel, wherof Hazael King of Damascus was the executioner. The cruelty of this barbarous Prince we may 2 King. 8. 12. find in the Prophecie of Elizeus, who fore-told it, saying: Their strong Cities shalt thou set on fire; and their young men shalt thou slay with the sword, and shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rend in pieces their women with child. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie upon all the Land. For the furie of Hazaels victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few towns, nor wearied with one invasion; but he
2 Kin. 10. 32. smote them in all the coast of Israel, and wasted all the Countrie beyond the River of Jordan. Notwithstanding all these calamities, it seems that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; (For in those dayes the Lord began to loath Israel;) but rather it is likely, that they bemoaned the noble house of Ahab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had bravely fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father had won: whereas now they were fain to make wofull shifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemies. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can find all manner of difficulties in serving him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in stead of the ease and the pleasure to themselves propounded by contrary courses, overwhelmed with the troubles which they sought to avoid; and therein by God, whom they first forsook, forsaken, and left unto the wretched labours of their own blind wisdome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence.

§. III.

of Athaliah's Government.

THese calamities falling upon Israel, kept Athalia safe on that side, giving her leisure to look to things at home: as having little to doe abroad, unlesse it were so that she held some correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate her husbands grandfather King Asa, who had done the like. And some probabilitie that she did so, may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For we 2 Chro. 24. 7. find, that this wicked Athalia and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon Baalim. Such a sacriledge, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her own Idolatrie, with such pomp as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some fair pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring: in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successour was fain to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the taste of that which was formerly thence extracted for his sake.

Under this impious government of Athalia, the devotion of the Priests and Levites was very notable, and served (no doubt) very much to retain the people in the religion taught by God himself, howsoever the Queens proceedings advanced the contrary. For the povertie of that sacred Tribe of Levi must needs have been exceeding great at this time, all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being utterly lost, the oblations and other perquisites, by which they lived, being now very few and small; and the store, ſtore laid up in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by ſhamefull robberie. Yet they up-held in all this miſerie the ſervice of God, and the daily ſacrifice, keeping daily their courſes, and performing obedience to the high Prieſt, no leſſe than in thoſe dayes wherein their entertainment was farre better.

§. IV. of the preſervation of Joas.

Jehoiada then occupied the high Prieſthood, an honourable, wiſe, and religious man. To his carefulneſſe it may be aſcribed, that the ſtate of the Church was in ſome ſlender ſort up-held in thoſe unhappy times. His wife was Iehoſhabeth, who was daughter of King Iehoram, and ſiſter to Ahazia, a godly Lady and vertuous, whoſe piety makes it ſeem that Athalia was not her mother, though her acceſſe to the Court argue the contrarie: but her diſcreet carriage might more eaſily procure her welcome to her own Fathers houſe, than the education under ſuch a Mother could have permitted her to be ſuch as ſhe was. By her care Ioaſh the young Prince that reigned ſoon after, was conveighed out of the nurſerie, when Athalia deſtroyed all the Kings children, and was carried ſecretly into the Temple, where as ſecretly he was brought up. How it came to paſſe that this young child was not hunted out, when his body was miſſing; nor any great reckoning (for ought that we find) made of his eſcape, I will not ſtand to examine: for it was not good in policie, that the people ſhould hear ſay, that one of the children had avoyded that cruell blow; it might have made them hearken after innovations, and ſo be the leſſe conformable to the preſent government. So Ioaſh was delivered out of that ſlaughter, he and his nurſe being gone no man could tell whither, and might be thought peradventure to be caſt away, as having no other guard than a poor woman that gave him ſuck, who fooliſhly doubting that ſhe her ſelf ſhould have been ſlain, was fled away with him into ſome deſolate place, where it was like enough that ſhe and he ſhould periſh. In ſuch caſes flatterers, or men deſirous of reward, eaſily coin ſuch tales, and rather ſweare them to be true in their own knowledge, than they will loſe the thanks due to their joyfull tidings.

§. V.
Whoſe ſonne Joas was.

†. I.
Whether Joas may be thought likely to have been the ſon of Ahazia.

NOw concerning this Ioaſh, whoſe ſon hee was, it is a thing of much difficultie to affirm, and hath cauſed much controverſie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the ſon of Ahazia, ſeem plain enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give title of Sonne unto him, in regard that hee was his ſucceſſour, I neither by my ſelf can find, nor can by any help of Authors learn how to anſwer the difficulties appearing in the contrary opinions of them, that think him to have been, or not, the naturall ſon of Ahazia. For whereas it is ſaid, that the houſe of Ahazia was not able to retain the Kingdome; ſome doe inferre that this Ioaſh was not properly called his ſon, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore ſucceeded him, as ſonne in the inheritance of his father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For ſhe perceiving that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom ſhee had no intereſt, might eaſily find cauſe to fear, that the tyrannie exerciſed by her husband at her inſtigation upon ſo many noble Houſes, would now be revenged upon her ſelf. The ruine of her Idolatrous Religion might in this caſe terrifie both her and her Minions, the ſentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of Jezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queen. All this had litle concerned her, if her own grand-child had been heir to the Crown; for ſhe that had power enough to make her ſelf Queen, could with more eaſe, and leſſe envie, have taken upon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie ſhe might have done her pleaſure, and been the more both obeyed by others;

2 King. 11. 2. & 2 Chr. 22. 11.

and

and secure of her own estate, as not wanting an heir. Wherefore it was not needfull, that she should be so unnatural, as to destroy the Child of her own Son, of whose life she might have made greater use than she could of his death: whereas indeed, the love of Grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little lesse than the Mothers to their Children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seem incredible, that all naturall affection should be cast a-side, when as neither necessitie urgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requireth it, yea, when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perswaded.

§. II.

That Joas did not descend from Nathan.

BUt (as it is more easie to find a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise been) the pedigree of this Joash is, by them which think him not the son of Ahazia, set down in such sort, that it may very justly be suspected. They say, that he descended from Nathan the son of David, and not from Salomon: to which purpose they bring a Historie (I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, saying, that the line of Salomon held the kingdom with this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succeed it. Concerning this Nathan the son of David, there are that would have him to be Nathan the Prophet, who, as they think, was by David adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward he revoked it, as was meet; for this Nathan is reckoned among the sons of David, by Bathsua the daughter of Ammiel, and therefore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I find him cited by Peter Martyr) and after him Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, have likewise held the same of Joash, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan and those other brethren of Salomon by the same Mother, are thought, upon good likelihoods, to have bin the children of Uria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by sundrie of the Fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew Expositors of that place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himself the only begotten of his mother, doe approve this exposition: for we read of no more than two sons which Bathsua or Bathsheba did bear unto David, whereof the one begotten in adulterie, died an Infant, and Salomon onely of her children by the King did live. So that the rest must needs have bin the children of Uria, and are thought to have bin David's only by adoption. Wherefore if Joas had not bin the son of Ahazia, then must that pedigree have bin false, wherein S. Matthew deriveth him lineally from Salomon; yea, then had not our blessed Saviour issued from the loins of David, according to the flesh, but had only bin of his line by courtesie of the Nation, and form of law, as any other might have bin. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawn many late writers into the opinion that Joash was not of the posteritie of Salomon, it is enough to say, that this was Friar Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter; but Annius can make Authors to speak what he list.

1 Chron. 3. 5.

§. III.

That Joas may probably be thought to have been the son of Jehoram,

IN so doubtfull a case, if it seem lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet thought upon, me thinks it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickednes of Jehoram the son of Jehosaphat King of Juda, for which he and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of David, that according to his promise hee would give him a light, and to his children for ever: the other doth say, that for the offences of the same Jehoram, there was not a son left him, save Jehoahas the youngest of his sons. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to David, that after those massacres of Jehoram upon all his brethren, and of the Philistims and Arabians upon the children of Jehoram, one of the seed of David escaped; why may it not be thought that hee was said to have escaped, in whom the line of David was preserved? for had all the race of Salo-

were here to be cut up in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some remembrance more particular would have been remaining of an event so memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord, as it is recounted by S. Luke: but the preservation of the house of David, mentioned in the books of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Jehoahas, in whom the Royall branch of Salomon, the naturall, and not only legall issue remaining of David, was kept alive. Wherefore it may be thought that this Joash, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the youngest son of Jehoram, whose wife Athalia, as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not easily understood, why the preservation of Davids line, by Gods especiall mercie, in regard of his promise made, should pertain rather to that time, when besides Ahazia himself, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another place they are called) sons of his brethren remaining alive, which afterwards were all slain by Jehu; than have reference to the lamentable destruction and little lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one only did escape. Certainly that inhumane murther which Jehoram committed upon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historie) revenged upon his own children, then was not this vengeance of God accomplished by the Philistims and Arabians, but being only begun by them, was afterwards prosecuted by Jehu, and finally took effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation he had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavie judgement laid upon Jehoram and all his children, onely Jehoahas his youngest sonne was exempted, whom therefore if I should affirm to be the same with Joas, which is called the son of Ahazia, I should not want good probabilitie. Some further appearance of necessitie there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise have been. For it was the youngest sonne of Jehoram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, seeing that he was twenty years old at the least (as is already noted) when he began to reign, and consequently, was born in the eighteenth or twentieth year of his Fathers age. Now I know not whether of the two is more unlikely, either that Jehoram should have begotten many children before hee was eighteen years old, or that having (as he had) many wives and children, he should upon the sudden, at his eighteenth year, become unfruitfull, and beget no more in twenty years following: each of which must have bin true, if this were true that Ahazia was the same Jehoahas which was his youngest sonne. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse crueltie of Athalia, in seeking the life of Joas are easily cleered, if Joas and Jehoahas were one. Neither doth his age withstand this opinion; For he was seven years old when he began to reign; which if we understand of years compleat, he might have been a year old at the death of Jehoram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sickneſse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the naturall son of Jehoram, though called the son of Ahazia, than it were to say, as great Authors have done, this difficultie notwithstanding, that he was of the posteritie of Nathan. One thing indeed I know not how to answer; which, had it concurred with the rest, might have served as the foundation of this opinion. The name of Jehoahas, that soundeth much more neer to Joas, than to Ahaziah, in an English ear, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diversitie of certain letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Western manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Ahazia himself be also called Azaria, and must have had three names, if he were the same with Jehoahas; in which manner Joas might also have had severall names; yet, because I find no other warrant hereof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an opinion upon the weak foundation of mine own conjecture, but leave all to the consideration of such as have more abilitie to judge, and leisure to consider of this point.

§. IV.

Upon what reasons Athalia might seek to destroy Joas, if he were her own grandchild.

IF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the text according to the letter, it may be said, that Athalia was not only blinded by the passions

pos of ambition and zeal to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some unnaturall desires, in seeking the destruction of her grand-child, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwayes chast) had imitated the libertie of Iezabel her sister in law, whose whore-domes were upbraided by Iehu to her son; or whether she had children by some former husband, before she was married unto Joram (which is not unlikely, in regard of her age, who was daughter of Omri, and sister to Ahab) certain it is that she had sons of her own, and those old enough to be employed as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to be wondred at, that to settle the crown upon her own children, she did seek to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claims. As for Joah, if she were his grand-mother, yet she might mistrust the interest which his mother would have in him, lest when he came to years, it might draw him from her devotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better love their daughters husbands, than their sons wives) there is some appearance in the reign of her son; for she made him spend all his time in idle journeys, to no other apparent end, than that she might rule at home; and he living abroad be estranged from his wife, and entertain some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to be his Tutoresse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in sunder all these fine devices, then was Athalia fain to goe roundly to work, and doe as she did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather think) she were onely stepdame to Joas, we need not seek into the reasons moving her to take away his life; her own hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

§. VI.

A digression, wherein is maintained the libertie of using conjecture in Histories.

THus much concerning the person of Joas, from whom, as from a new root, the tree of David was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diversitie betweene it and others, the lesse me thinks I need to suspect mine own presumption, as deserving blame, for curiositie in matter of doubt, or boldnesse in liberty of conjecture. For all Histories doe give us information of humane counsels and events, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can afford; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speak onely at randome, and many times falsly. This we often find in prophane writers, who ascribe the ill successe of great undertakings, to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeed God abhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omission. Hereat we may the lesse wonder, if we consider the answer made by the Jewes in Egypt unto Jeremie the Prophet reprehending their Idolatrie. For howsoever the written Law of God was known unto the people, and his punishments laid upon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinatly bent unto their wills, that they would not by any means be drawn to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophet roundly, that they would worship the Queen of heaven, as they and their fathers, their Kings and their Princes had used to doe: For then (say they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no evill: adding, that all manner of miseries were befaln them, since they left off that service of the Queen of Heaven. So blind is the wisedome of man, in looking into the counsell of God, which to find out, there is no better nor other guide than his own written will not perverted by vain additions.

Jer. 44. 17, 18.

But this Historie of the Kings of Israel and Juda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that have been written by the most sufficient of meerly humane Authors: it setteth down expresly the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his over-forwardnesse in battell; the ruine of his Familie, to the securitie of Jehoram in Jezreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the comming of Jehu; but referring all unto the will of God, I mean, to his revealed will, from which that his hidden purposes doe not varie, this Story, by many great examples, gives most notable proofs. True it is, that the concurrence of second causes with their effects, is in these books nothing largely described; nor perhaps haps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir Philip Sidnie, that Historians doe borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwaies true, and notorious actions commonly insufficient to discover the passions which doe set them first on foot. Wherefore they are fain (I speak of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Livie every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against Asdrubal in Italy, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kind, is neither Historicall, nor Poeticall) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or the instruments by which they wrought; from whence they do collect the most likely motives or impediments of every businesse; and so figuring as neer to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they judiciously consider the defects in counsell, or obliquity in proceeding. S. Phi. Sid. in his Apol. for Poetry.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, howsoever it may give satisfaction. For the heart of man is unsearchable: and Princes, howsoever their intents bee seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which prie both into them, and into such as live about them; yet sometimes either by their own close temper, or by some subtill mists, they conceal the truth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lye dead, and buried in oblivion, when the preparations which they begat, are converted to another use. The industrie of an Historian, having so many things to wearie it, may well bee excused, when finding apparent cause enough of things done, it forbeareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where sundry occasions work to the same end, that one small matter in a weak mind is more effectuall, than many that seem farre greater. So comes it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or towns, begin with a few strawes, that are wasted or not seen; when the flame is discovered, having fastened upon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against the Greeks, proceeded from desire of the Persians to inlarge their Empire: howsoever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was noised abroad as the ground of that quarrell; yet Herodotus telleth us, that the wanton desire of Queen Atossa, to have the Grecian dames her bond-women, did first move Darius to prepare for this war before he had received any injury, and when he did not yet so much desire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten. Hero. lib. 1.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus be more justly reprehended by some, or defended by others, for alleging the vain appetite, and secret speech of the Queen to bee with her husband, as the cause of those great evils following; this I may boldly affirm, (having, I think, in every estate some sufficient witnesse) that matters of much consequence, founded in all seeming upon substantiall reasons, have issued indeed from such pettie trifles, as no Historian would either think upon, or could well search out.

Therefore it was a good answer that Sixtus Quintus the Pope, made to a certain Frier, comming to visit him in his Popedome, as having long before in his meaner estate, been his familiar friend. This poor Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to use his old liberty of speech, adventured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom hee rather took for a direct honest man, than any cunning Politian, to attain unto the Papacy; in compassing of which, all the subtilty (said he) of the most crafty brains, find work enough: and therefore the more I think upon the Art of the Conclave, and your unaptnesse thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plain dealing Frier, dealt with him again as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seen by what folly this world is governed, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred unto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is moved, the Pope said true. For the wisest of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, work more closely, and earnestly, than right reason either needs or can. But if wee lift up our thoughts to that supreme Governour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was said of Jupiter,

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat
Ventosum, & urbes, regnaque tristia,
Divosque mortalesque turmas,
Imperio regit unus æquo.

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-swoln streams,
The civill Cities and th'infernall Realms,
Who th'host of heaven, and the mortall band,
Alone doth govern by his just command.

Then shall wee find the quite contrary. In him there is no uncertainty nor change; hee foreseeth all things, and all things disposeth to his own honour; Hee neither deceiveth nor can be deceived, but continuing one and the same for ever, doth constantly govern all creatures by that Law, which he hath prescribed, and will never alter. The vanities of men beguile their vain contrivers, and the prosperity of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightfull as it seems at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poysons which infect the soul, many cruell thorns deeply wounding the body; all which, if any few escape, they have onely this miserable advantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the service of God is the path guiding us to perfect happinesse, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicity, yeelding such abundance of joy to the conscience, as doth easily countervail all afflictions whatsoever; though indeed those brambles that sometimes tear the skin of such as walk in this blessed way, doe commonly lay hold upon them at such time as they sit down to take their ease, and make them wish themselves at their journeys end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serve, in whose presence is the fulnesse of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for ever.

Psalm. 66. 11.

Wherefore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisedome as may guide our desires and actions, we should not marvell though the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda and Israel, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct us chiefly, in that which is most requisite for us to know; as the means to attain unto true felicity, both here, and hereafter, propounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisedome. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the captivity: we may well beleeve that the counsell of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should have occupied either the whole or the principall room in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, been the lesse true, though they might have been omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had been lawfull for any man to gather out of prophane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein he should not have done injury to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborn to derogate from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more than was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I have now in hand: wherein I cannot beleeve that any man of judgement will tax me, as either fabulous or presumptuous. For hee doth not feign, that rehearseth probabilities as bare conjectures; neither doth he deprave the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reason, those things which authoritie alone, without further circumstance, ought to have confirmed in every mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the liberty which I have used in conjectures, and may hereafter use when occasion shall require, as neither unlawfull, nor mis-beseeming an Historian.

The conspiracie against Athalia.

WHen Athalia had now six years and longer worn the Crown of Juda, and hand found neither any forreign enemy, nor domesticall adversarie to disturb her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wicwickednesse meeting together, took her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the young Prince began to be such, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very unfitting that his education should be simple, to make him seem the child of some poor man (as for his safety it was requisite,) when his capacity required to have been indued with the stomack and qualities meet for a King. All this Jehojada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impiety, which taking deep root in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe over all the Country, if care were not used to weed it up very speedily. Wherefore he associated unto himself five of the Captains, in whose fidelity hee had best assurance; and having taken an oath of them, and shewed them the Kings son, hee made a Covenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repair to Jerusalem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to win them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord unto the house of David, was enough to assure them that the action was both lawfull, and likely to succeed as they desired.

But in compassing their intent, some difficulties appeared: For it was not to be hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good issue; neither were the Captains, and other associats of Jehojada able by close working, to draw together so many trusty and serviceable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To help in this case, the Priest gave order to such of the Levites as had finished their courses in waiting on the Divine service at the Temple, and were now relieved by others that succeeded in their turns, that they should not depart untill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not discharging the old, hee had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would be able to deal with the Queens ordinary Guard, and that was enough: for if the Tyrannesse did not prevail against them at the first brunt, the favour of the People was like to shew it self on their side, who made head against her. These Levites were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captains, and other adherents, where bestowed in the utter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it self had store enough; King David had left an Armory to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, wherein this high design was to be put in execution; Jehojada delivered unto the Captains, Armour for them and their adherents, appointed a guard unto the Kings person, produced him openly, and gave unto him the Crown; using all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queen was the last that heard any word. Which is not so strange as it may seem: for insolent natures, by dealing outragiously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly lose the benefit of hearing what is to be feared, whilest yet it may be prevented, and have no information of danger, till their own eyes, amazed with the suddennesse, behold it in the shape of inevitable mischiefe.

All Jerusalem was full of the rumour, and entertained it with very good liking. Some carried home the newes, others ran forth to see, and the common joy was so great, that without apprehension of perill, under the windowes of the Court, were the people running and praising the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the extraordinary concourse, and noise of folks in the streets, making towards the Temple, with much unusuall passion in their looks, did presently conceive, that somewhat worthy of her care was happened; though, what it might be, she did not apprehend. Howsoever it were, she meant to use her own wisedome in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that she thought it some especiall solemnitie used in the Divine service, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the unaccustomed number of Levites, and of other devout men, about the town, might give some presumption. 2 Chro. 23. 12.

Many things argue that she little thought upon her own Tragedy, although Josephus would make it seem otherwise. For we find in the Text, She came to the people into the house of the Lord (which was neer to her Palace) and that when she looked and saw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was with the Princes, or great men of the 1 Chro. 23. 12 & 13. 2. 1 Kin. 6. 11. 7. 13. 14.

Land by him, and the Trumpeters proclaiming him, ſhee rent her clothes, and cryed Treaſon, Treaſon. Hereby it appears that ſhee was quietly going, without any miſtruſt or fear, to take her place; which when ſhe found occupied by another, then ſhe began to afflict her ſelf, as one caſt away, and cried out in vain upon the Treaſon, whereby ſhe ſaw that ſhe muſt periſh. But that ſhe came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as Joſephus reporteth) and that her company being beaten back, ſhe entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the young Tyrant, I find no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had ſhe truly known how things went, ſhe would ſurely have gathered her friends about her, and uſed thoſe forces in defence of her Crown, by which ſhe gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainly, if it were granted, that ſhe, like a new Semiramus, did march in the head of her troop, yet it had been meer madneſſe in her, to enter the place alone, when her aſſiſtants were kept out; but if ſhee, perceiving that neither her authority, nor their own weapons, could prevail to let in her guard, would nevertheleſſe take upon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of ſeven years old a Conſpirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom ſhee ſaw to bee armed in his defence, may we not think that ſhe was mad in the moſt extreme degree? Certain it is that the counſell of God would have taken effect, in her deſtruction, had ſhe uſed the moſt likely means to diſappoint it: yet we need not ſo cut her throat with any morall impoſſibilities. It is enough to ſay, that the godly zeal of Jehojada found more eaſie ſucceſſe, through her indiſcretion, than otherwiſe could have been expected; ſo that at his appointment, ſhee was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and ſlain, yea ſo, that no bloud, ſave her own, was ſhed in that quarrell; her ſmall train that ſhe brought along with her, not daring to ſtand in her defence.

§. VIII.

The death of Athalia, with a compariſon of her and Jezabel.

MOſt like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the raſhneſſe of her Nephew Jehoram the Iſraelite, who did fooliſhly caſt himſelf into the very throat of danger, gaping upon him, onely through his eager deſire of quickly knowing what the matter meant: yet ſhee her ſelfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived ſuch a life as Jezabel had done, was rewarded with a ſuitable death. Theſe two Queens were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband, was an Idolatreſſe and a Murdreſſe. The onely difference appearing in their condition, is, that Jezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them ſurviving her husband about eight years, did ſpend their time in ſatisfying her own affections; the one uſing tyrannie, as the exercice of her haughty mind; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her unchaſte body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in thoſe things which may ſeem in this world to pertain unto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the ſudden by Conſpirators, and each of them exclaiming upon the Treaſon, received ſentence from the mouth of one that had lived under her ſubjection; in execution whereof, Jezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horſes; Athalia ſlain at her own horſe-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leiſure to vex her proud heart; that of Jezabel the more indignitie, and ſhame of body. Touching their buriall, Jezabel was devoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not find. Like enough it is, that ſhe was buried, as having not perſecuted and ſlain the Lords Prophets, but ſuffered the Prieſts to exerciſe their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument, for ſhe was a Church-robber. The ſervice of Baal erected by theſe two Queens, was deſtroyed as ſoon as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Prieſts of that Religion, ſlain. Herein alſo it came to paſſe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who ſlew them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the ſame hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who ſeems to have been her good friend) pretended her revenge, as any part of his quarrell to Juda. Concerning children, all belonging to Jezabel periſhed in few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behind her, it is uncertain; she had sons living after she was Queen, of whom, or of any other, that they were slaine with her, we doe not find.

This is a matter not unworthy of consideration, in regard of much that may depend upon it. For if the children of Athalia had been in Jerusalem when their Mother fell, their death would surely have followed hers as neerely, and beene registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Baal. That Law by which God forbad that the children should die for the fathers, could not have saved these ungracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that every man should die for his own sinne. Seeing therefore that they had been professors and advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoile of it; likely it is, that they should not have escaped with life, if Jehojada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death, so the security of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craved as much, and that very earnestly. For these had been esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, & being reckoned as her assistants in that particular businesse of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great sway in other matters, as Princes, and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is evident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres against Jehu) absent from Jerusalem; whereby Jehojada might, with the more confidence, adventure to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate. Deut. 24. 16.

Chap. XXII.

Of Joas and Amasia, with their Contemporaries; where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

Of Joas his doings, whilest Jehojada the Priest lived.

BY the death of Athalia, the whole countrie of Juda was filled with great joy and quietnesse, wherein Joas, a child of seven yeeres old or there-about, began his reign, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minority, he lived under the protection of that honourable man Jehojada the Priest, who did as faithfully govern the Kingdome, as he had before carefully preserved the Kings life, & restored him unto the Throne of his ancestors. When he came to mans estate, he took by appointment of Jehojada two wives, & begat Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of David which was almost worn out. The first Act that hee took in hand, when hee began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of work, in regard of the decay wherein that holy place was fallen, through the wickednesse of ungodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that hee should up-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had up-held. This businesse he followed with so earnest a zeal, that not only the Levites were more slack than he, but even Jehojada was faine to be quickened by his admonition. Money was gathered for the charges of the work; partly out of the taxe imposed by Moses, partly out of the liberality of the people; who gave so freely, that the Temple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and silver; and with all other Utensiles. The sacrifices likewise were offered, as under godly Kings they had beene, and the service of God was magnificently celebrated. 2 Chro. 24. 14.

§. II.

The Death of Jehojada, and Apostasie of Joas.

BUt this endured no longer than the life of Jehojada the Priest: who having lived an hundred and thirty yeeres, dyed before his Countrie could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Juda, as he well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little of rooting up themselves, and all their issue. Yet this honourable Funerall seems to have bin given to him, at the motion of the people; it being said, They buried him in the Citie of David. As for the King himself, who did owe to him no lesse than his Crown and life, he is not likely to have been Author of it, seeing that hee was as easily comforted after his death, as if he had thereby been discharged of some heavie debt.

For after the death of Jehojada, when the Princes of Juda began to flatter their King, he soon forgat, not only the benefits received by this worthy man his old Counsellour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea & God himself, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Feboram and Athalia had so infected the Country, in fifteen or sixteen yeeres, that thirty yeeres, or there-about, of the reigne of Joas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were not able to cleere it from that mischiefe. The King himself, when once he was entred into these courses, ran on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his liberty, to despise the service of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King indeed, that he regarded no longer the sowre admonitions of devout Priests. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeal was only counterfeited, wherein like an Actor upon the stage, he had striven to expresse much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

§. III.

The causes and times of the Syrians invading Juda in the dayes of Joas.

BUt God, from whom hee was broken loose, gave him over into the hands of men, that would not easily bee shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himself towards Jerusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich booty, did invite him. He had an Army heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the war (if his ambition cared for pretences) it was enough that the Kings of Juda had assisted the Israelites, in their enterprises upon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I think hee did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Juda had molested the Aramites in the time of his predecessour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour Israel, & leaving the ten Tribes in their extreme misery, to the fury of Hazael himself. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre up against himself a powerfull enemy, before he had assured the conquest of Israel, that lay between Jerusalem and his own Kingdome, if some opportunity had not performed such easie and good successe, as might rather advance, than any way disturbe his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries usually doe) to draw many partakers of their own to his side; and not to remain, as Joas did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to joyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of Jehu his posterity, who, like a bloudy Traitor, had utterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, even the whole house of Ahab, to which hee was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparent reason to invade the Kingdome of Juda. Howsoever it were, we find it plainly, that Joas was affraid of him, and therefore took all the hallowed things, and all the gold that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his own house, with which present hee redeemed his peace: the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargain, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazzard the assurance of this for the possibility of not much more. So Hazael departed with a rich bootie of unhappy treasure, which belonging to the living God, remained a small while in the possession of this mighty, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the grave. For in the thirtie seventh yeere of Joas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoahaz, hee made this purchace; but in the same or very next yeere he died, leaving all that hee had unto his Sonne Benhadad, with whom these treasures prospered no otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazaels, is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites upon Juda, mentioned in the second book of Chronicles. But the reasons alleged by them that hold the contrary opinion, doe forcibly prove, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloud-shed or fight; in the latter, Joas tryed the fortune of a battaile, wherin being put to the worst, he lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life. In the one, Hazael himself was present; in the other, hee was not named: but contrariwise, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seem to have then been the Sonn of Hazael) is said to have been at Damascus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Juda; The second was a small company of men, which did animate Joas (in vaine, for God was against him) to deal with them, as having a very great Armie. 2 Chron. 24

Now, concerning the time of this former invasion, I cannot perceive that God forsooke him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeed some, very learned, who think that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Jehoiada the Priest, because that storie is joyned unto the restauration of the Temple. This had been probable, if the death of Jehoiada had been afterwards mentioned in that place of the second book of Kings; or if the Apostasie of Joas, or any other matter implying so much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his own will & pleasure; neither was he more unjust in the afflictions of Job that righteous man, or the death of Josias that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid upon Pharaoh, or his judgements upon the house of Ahab. But it appeares plainly, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were used in the house of the Lord continually, all the 2 Chron. 24. 14 dayes of Jehoiada; soone after whose death, if not immediately upon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the sixt, or thirty seventh yeere of this Joas his reign, the King falling away from the God of his Fathers, became a foule Idolater.

And indeed we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God sometimes to lay upon his servants without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, have alwayes tended unto the bettering of their good. In which respect, even the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of his Saints being precious in the sight of the Lord) are to Psal. 116. 15. their great advantage. But with evill and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even and strict account, permitting usually their faults to get the start of their punishment, & either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amorites) till their wickednesse be full; or not working their amendment by his correction, but suffering them to run on in their wicked courses, to their greater misery. So hath he dealt with many; and so it appeares that hee dealt with Joas. For this unhappy man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if hee had strove to exceed the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leave such a villanous pattern unto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should endure to imitate.

§. IV.

How Zacharia was murthered by Joas.

Sundry Prophets having laboured in vaine to reclaime the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of Jehoiada the Priest, was stirred up at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wickednesse, and make them understand the punishment due unto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so much honoured, and sonne to a man so exceedingly beloved in his life time, and reverenced, that if Joas had reputed him (as Ahab did Elias) his open enemie, yet ought he in common honesty, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have used at least some part of

of the respect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had born unto the King, and the unrecountable benefits which they had done unto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Joas, yea though hee had bin otherwise a man of very small mark, and not very good condition. The truth is, that the message of a Prophet sent from God, should be heard with reverence, how simple soever he appeares that brings it. But this King Joas, having already scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandmen, in that parable of our Saviour, dealt with the heir of the Vineyard; who said, This is the heir, come let us kill him, that the inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that he was no free Prince, as long as one durst tell him the plain truth, how great soever that mans deservings were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any forme of open Law, as was practised upon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treachery, I doe neither read, nor can conjecture. The dignity of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement, though that the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, and by order of Law, inflicted upon malefactors, may argue the contrary. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandement, by which he suffered, took place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath been already noted) was nothing strange amongst the Kings of Juda.

Luke 20. 14.

§. V.

How Joas was shamefully beaten by the Amonites, and of his death.

THis odious murther, committed by an unthankfull snake upon the man in whose bosome he had been fostered, as of it self alone it sufficed to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his own time, and his memory detested in all ages; so had it the well-described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompany it unto the Throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell down swiftly, and heavily upon the head of that ungratefull monster. It was the last yeere of his reign, the end of his time comming then upon him, when he thought himself beginning to live how he listed without controulment. When that yeer was expired, the Aramites came into the Country, rather as may seem to get pillage, than to performe any great action, for they came with a small company of men: but God had intended to do more by them, than they themselves did hope for.

2 Chron. 24. 24.

That Joas naturally was a coward, his bloudy malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement proof sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when hee might have leavied (as his son after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs be valiant, and make his people know, how stout of disposition their King was, when he might have his own will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. For to encounter with a few bands of Rovers, hee took a very great Army, so that wise men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expose himself to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere ostentation, and no perill to be feared; hee going forth so strongly appointed, against so weak enemies. Thus might wise men think, and laugh at him in secret, considering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisedome of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not only at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites & King Joas met, whether it were by some folly of the Leaders, or by some amazement happening among the souldiers, or by whatsoever means it pleased God to work, so it was, that that great Army of Juda received a notable over-throw, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Juda, at whose perswasion the King had become a Rebell to the King of Kings. As for Joas himself (as Abulensis and others expound expound the story) he was sorely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they think) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excessive ransome.

And surely, all circumstances do greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the Text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon Joas ignominious judgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All which argues, that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-favoredly. Now at that time Joas the son of Jehoahaz reigned over Israel, and Benhadad the son of Hazael over the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant undertaking Prince, raised up by God to restore the State of his miserable Country; the other inferiour every way to his father, of whose purchases hee lost a great part, for want of skill to keep it. The difference in condition found between these two Princes, promising no other event than such as afterward followed, might have given to the King of Juda good cause to be bold, and pluck up his spirits, which Hazael had beaten down, if God had not been against him. But his fearfull heart being likely to quake upon any apprehension of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with some shew of war at his doores, it were easie to make him crave any tolerable conditions of peace. The unexpected good successe hereof, already related, and the (perhaps as unsuspected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following wars against the King of Israel, sheweth plainly the weakneſse of all earthly might, resisting the power of the Almighty. For by his Ordinance, both the Kingdome of Juda, after more than forty years time of gathering strength, was unable to drive out a small company of Enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, having so been trodden down by Hazael, that onely fifty Horsemen, ten Chariots, and ten thousand Footmen were left; prevailed against his Son, and recovered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are every-where found, and therefore I will not insist upon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, think it more tedious to hear long and frequent reports of our heavenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore-fathers upon earth.

When the Aramites had what they listed, and saw that they were not able, being so few, to take any possession of the Country, they departed out of Juda loaden with spoile, which they sent to Damascus, themselves belike falling upon the ten Tribes, where it is to be thought that they sped not half so well. The King of Juda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sons of an Ammoniteſse, and of a Moabiteſse, whom some (because onely their Mothers names, being strangers, are expressed) think to have been bondmen. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or fear, lest (as Tyrants use) hee should revenge disaster upon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoever else it were that animated them to murder their King; the Scripture tells us plainly, that, For the blood of the children of Jehojada, this befell him. And the same appears to have been used as the pretence of their conspiracy, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the son and successor of Joas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his body was judged unworthy of buriall in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appears, that the death of Zacharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompenced by his sonne, upon the Traitors, with well-deserved death. 2 Chro. 24. 25

§. VI.

Of the Princes living in the time of Joas: of the time when Carthage was built: and of Dido.

THere lived with Joas, Mezades and Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Aristomedes in Corinth: about which time Agrippa Sylvius, and after him Sylvius Alladius, were Kings of the Albans in Italy. Ocrazapes, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirty seventh King succeeded unto Ophratanes, began his reign over the Assyrians, about the eighteenth year of Joas, which lasted forty two years. In the sixteenth of Joas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sesac, succeeded unto Cheops in the Kingdome of Egypt, and held it fifty years.

In this time of Joas, was likewise the reign of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of of Carthage by Dido, the building of which City is, by divers Authors, placed in divers ages, some reporting it to be 70. years younger than Rome, others above 400. years elder, few or none of them giving any reason of their assertions, but leaving us uncertain whom to follow: Josephus, who had read the Annals of Tyre, counting one hundred forty and three years and eight moneths from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth year of Hyram King of Tyre, to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the seventh of Pigmalion. The particulars of this accompt (which is not rare in Josephus) are very perplexed, and serve not very well to make cleer the totall summe. But whether it were so that Josephus did omit, or else that he did miss-write some number of the years, which he reckoneth in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pigmalion; we may well enough beleeve, that the Tyrian writers, out of whose books hee gives us the whole summe, had good means to know the truth, and could nighly reckon the difference of time, between two works no longer following one the other than the memory of three or four generations might easily reach. This hundred forty and four years current, after the building of Salomons Temple, being the eleventh year of Foas, was a hundred forty and three years before the birth of Rome; and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eighty and nine: a time so long after the death of Æneas, that we might truly conclude all to be fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honour her Statua with this Epigram:

Auson. ep. 117.

Ilia ego sum Dido vultu quam conspicis hospes,
Assimulata modis pulchraque mirificis.
Talis eram, sed non Maro quam mihi finxit, erat mens;
Vita nec incestis læta cupidinibus:
(Namque nec Æneas vidit me Troius unquam,
Nec Lybiam advenit, classibus Iliacis.
Sed furias fugiens, atque arma proterva Iarbæ;
Servavi, fateor, morte pudicitiam;
Pectore transfixo castos quod pertulit enses)
Fon furor, aut læso crudus amore dolor.
Sic cecidisse juvat: vixi sine vulnere famæ,
Ulta virum, positis mœnibus oppetii.
Invida cur in me stimulasti Musa Maronem,
Fingeret ut nostra damna pudicitiæ?
Vos magis Historicis lectores credite de me
Quam qui furta Deum concubitusque canunt.
Falsidici vates: temeram qui carmine verum,
Humanisque deos assimulant vitiis.

Which in effect is this.

I Am that Dido which thou here do'st see,
Cunningly fram'd in beauteous Imag'rie,
Like this I was, but had not such a soul,
As Maro feign'd, incestuous and foul.
Æneas never with his Trojan hoast
Beheld my face, or landed on this coast.
But flying proud Iarbas villanie,
Not mov'd by furious love or jealousie,
I did with weapon chaste, to save my fame,
Make way for death untimely, ere it came.
This was my end; but first I built a Town,
Reveng'd my husbands death, liv'd with renown.
Why did'st thou stirre up Virgil, envious Muse,
Falsely my name and honour to abuse?
Readers, beleeve Historians; not those Which to the world Joves thefts and vice expose.
Poets are lyars, and for verses sake
Will make the Gods of humane crimes partake.

From

From the time of Dido unto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we find in many Histories: but in particular wee find little of the Carthaginian affaires before that war, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts of the Isle of Sicil. We will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mighty Citie, untill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the mean while the History that is now in hand.

§. VII.

The beginning of Amazia his reign: Of Joas King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

Amazias, the son of Joash, being twenty five years old when his Father died, took possession of the Kingdome of Juda, wherein he laboured so to demean himself, as his new beginning reign might be least offensive. The Law of Moses hee professed to observe, which howsoever it had been secretly despised since the time of Jehoram, by many great persons of the land, yet had it by provision of good Princes, yea, and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deep root in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plausible, who did not conform himself unto it. And at that present time, the slaughter which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had withdrawn the late King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himself, even whilest that execrable murther, committed by the King upon Zecharia, was yet fresh in memory, did serve as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better sort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led to such an evill end. Hee therefore, having learned of his father the art of dissimulation, did not onely forbear to punish the Traitors that had slain King Joas, but gave way to the time, and suffered the dead body to be interred, as that of Jehoram formerly had been, in the City of David, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda. Nevertheless, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people having wearied it self into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoever their deed done, was applauded as the handie-worke of God) had neither any mighty partakers in their fact, nor strong maintainers of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken: the King, who perceived his government well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the heat of mens affections being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish between their treasons and Gods judgements, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to live: which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a revenging sonne. This being done, and his own life better secured, by such exemplary justice, against the like attempts, Amazia carried himself outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteen years.

As Amazia gathered strength in Juda by the commodity of a long peace, so Joas the Israelite grew as fast in power, by following the war hotly against the Aramites. Hee was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had been, worshipping the Calves of Jeroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Jehu, that the ten tribes wanted little of being utterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Jehu and his sonne Jehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Jehu, sufficed not to with-draw him from this politique Idolatry; so were the miseries, rewarding that impiety, unable to reclaim Jehoahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, did condescend unto the prayers of this ungodly Prince, even then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their own abominable wayes. Therefore in temporall matters the ten Tribes recovered apace; but the favour of God, which had been infinitely more worth, I doe not find, nor believe that they sought: that they had it not, I find in the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to Amazia, the Lord is not with Israel, neither with all the house of Ephraim. 2 Chro. 25.7.

Whether

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elisha, who lived in those times, did foretell the prosperity of the Israelites under the reign of Joas; or whether Jehoahaz, wearied and broken with long adversity, thought it the wisest way, to discharge himselfe in part of the heavie cares attending those unhappy Syrian Warres, by laying the but-
2 King. 13. 10 then upon his hopefull son; we find that in the thirtie seventh year of Joas, King of Juda, Joas the son of Jehoahaz began to reign over Israel in Samaria; which was in the 15. year of his fathers reign, and some two or three years before his death.

It appears that this young Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did so well husband that poor stock that he received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fifty Horsemen, and ten thousand Foot, that hee might seem likely to prove a thriver. Amongst other circumstances, the words which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse.
2 King. 13. 14 For Joas visiting the Prophet, who lay sick, spake unto him thus; O my father, my father the Chariot of Israel, and the horsemen of the same: by which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could doe.

This Prophet who succeeded unto Elias, about the first year of Joram the son of Ahab King of Israel died (as some have probably collected) about the third or fourth year of this Joas, the Nephew of Jehu. To shew how the spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest upon him, it exceedeth my faculty. This is recorded of him, that hee did not onely raise a dead child unto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselfe was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life unto a carcass, which touched them in the grave. In fine, hee bestowed as a legacie, three victories upon King Joas, who thereby did set Israel in a fair way of recovering all that the Aramites had usurped, and weakning the Kings of Damasco in such sort, that they were never after terrible to Samaria.

§. VIII.

Of Amazia his war against Edom; His Apostasie; and overthrow by Joas.

THe happy successe which Joas had found in his war against the Aramites, was such as might kindle in Amazia a desire of undertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His Kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand serviceable men for the Warres; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of war hee had very just against the Edomites, who having rebelled in the time of his grand-father Joram, had about fifty years been unreclaimed, partly by reason of the troubles happening in Juda, partly through the sloth and timerousnesse of his father Joas. Yet, forasmuch as the men of Juda had in many years been without all exercise of Warre (excepting that unhappy fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) hee held it a point of wisedome to increase his forces, with souldiers waged out of Israel, whence 2 Chro. 21. 6. Jos. Antip. Jud. l. 9. c. 10. he hired for an hundred talents of silver, an hundred thousand valiant men, as the Scripture telleth us, though Josephus diminish the number, saying that they were but twenty thousand.

This great Army, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Israel, hee was faine to dismisse before hee had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill successe, if he strengthened himselfe with the help of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gave them victory against the cruell Aramites) did not love, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to revenge, they fell upon a piece of Juda in their return, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men, and some spoil, which they carried away. But Amazia with his own forces, knowing that God would bee assistant to their journey, entred couragiously into the Edomites Countrie; over whom obtaining victory, he slew ten thousand, and took other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rock; holding them, it seems, rather as Traytors, than as just enemies. This victory did not seem to reduce Edom under the subjection of the Crown of Juda; which might be the cause of that severity, which was used to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the lives of their friends and kinsmen at so dear a rate, as the losse of their own libertie. Some towns in Mount for, Amazia took, as appears by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefensible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another year the better have pursued the conquest of the whole country. Howsoever it were, he got both honour by the journey, and gains enough, had he not lost himself.

Among other spoyles of the Edomites, were carryed away their gods; which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserve well to be led in triumph. But they conversewise, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this unworthy King Amazia, that he set them up to be his gods, and worshipped them, and burned incense unto them. 2 Chro. 25. 14

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet sent from God, hee gave a churlish and threatning answer; asking the Prophet, Who made him a Counsellor, and bidding him hold his peace for fear of the worst. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workmanship and beauty, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had ravished the Kings fancie; me thinkes, he should have rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby have suffered himself to be blinded, with such unreasonable devotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to work much upon his imagination; much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seems to me, that the same affections carried him from God, unto the service of Idols, which afterwards moved him to talk so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had already obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie forces as he had gathered out of Israel; which done, it is sayd, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather assist him by miracle, than let him faile of obtaining all his hearts desire. But with better reason he should have limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Esau having broken the yoak of Jacob from his neck, according as Isaac had fore-told, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amazia did hope to re-conquer all the Country of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home both profit and honour, which might have well contented him. 2 Chro. 25. 11

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wherewith men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe unto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to use their own industrie, courage, or fore-sight. Therefore it is commonly seen, that they, who entring into battell, are carefull to pray for aide from heaven, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giver of victory; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their own exploits; one telling how he got such a ground of advantage; another, how he gave check to such a battalion; a third, how he seized on the enemies Canon; every one striving to magnifie himself, whilest all forget God, as one that had not been present in the action. To ascribe to fortune the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better successe, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Author of his happinesse; so he whose meere wisdome and labour hath brought things, to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himself thankfull, both for the victory, and for those vertues by which the victory was gotten. And indeed so far from weaknesse is the nature of such thanksgiving, that it may well be called the height of magnanimitie; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of man advanceth it selfe with confidence of acceptation, unto the love of God. In which sense it is a brave speech that Evander in Virgil useth to Æneas, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition:

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

With this Philosophy Amazia (as appears by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himself a better man of war than any King of Juda, since the time of Jehosaphat, and could be well contented, that his people should think him little inferiour to David; of which honour he saw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him lose an hundred talents, and done him no pleasure; he having prevailed by plain force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That hee was distempered with such vain thoughts as these (besides the witnesse of his impietie following) Josephus doth testifie Jos. Ant. 9. c. 10.

teſtifie; ſaying, That he deſpiſed God, and that being puft up with his good ſucceſſe, of which nevertheleſſe he would not acknowledge God to be the Author, he commanded Foas King of Iſrael to become his ſubject, and to let the ten Tribes acknowledge him their Soveraign, as they had done his Anceſtours King David and Salomon. Some think that his quarrell to Foas was rather grounded upon the injurie done to him by the Iſraelites, whom hee diſmiſſed in the journey againſt Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the ſenſe of a late wrong had more power to ſtirre him up, than the remembrance of an old title, forgotten long ſince, and by himſelfe neglected thirteen, or fourteen years. Nevertheleſſe it might ſo be, that when he was thus provoked, hee thought it not enough to requite new wrongs, but would alſo call old matters into queſtion; that ſo the Kings of Iſrael might, at the leaſt, learn to keep their ſubjects from offending Juda, for fear of endangering their own Crowns. Had Amazia deſired onely recompence for the injury done to him, it is not improbable that hee ſhould have had ſome reaſonable anſwer from Foas, who was not deſirous to fight with him. But the anſwer which Foas returned, likening himſelf to a Cedar, and Amazia in reſpect of him to no better than a thiſtle, ſhewes that the challenge was made in inſolent termes, ſtuft perhaps with ſuch proud compariſon of Nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which Joſephus hath written) between a King of antient race, and one of leſſe nobilitie than vertue.

Sophocles in Ajace Lor.

It is by Sophocles reported of Ajax, that when going to the warre of Troy, his father did bid him to be valiant, and get victory by Gods aſſiſtance, he made anſwer, That by Gods aſſiſtance a coward could get victory, but hee would get it alone without ſuch help: after which proud ſpeech, though he did many valiant acts, he had ſmall thanks, and finally, killing himſelfe in a madneſſe, whereinto he fell upon diſgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did utter ſuch words, I doe not find: but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of ſuch words, he was rewarded with ſucceſſe according. The very firſt counſell wherein this warre was concluded, ſerves to prove that he was a wiſe Prince indeed at Jeruſalem, among his Paraſites, but a fool when he had to deal with his equalls abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a weak people, truſting more in the ſeat of their Countrey, than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with Foas, who from ſo poor beginnings had raiſed himſelfe to ſuch ſtrength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thouſand men, and had all his Nation exerciſed, and trained up in a long victorious warre. But as Amazia diſcovered much want of judgement, in undertaking ſuch a match; ſo in proſecuting the buſineſſe, when it was ſet on foot, he behaved himſelfe as a man of little experience, who having once onely tryed his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in Warre there was nothing elſe to doe, than ſend a defiance, fight, and winne. Foas on the contrary ſide, having been accuſtomed to deal with a ſtronger enemie than the King of Juda, uſed that celeritie, which peradventure had often ſtood him in good ſtead againſt the Aramite. He did not ſit waiting till the enemies brake in and waſted his Countrey, but preſented himſelfe with an Armie in Juda, ready to bid battell to Amazia, and ſave him the labour of a long journey. This could not but greatly diſcourage thoſe of Juda; who (beſides the impreſſion of fear which an invaſion beats into people, not inured in the like) having devoured in their greedy hopes, the ſpoyle of Iſrael, fully perſwading themſelves to get as much, and at as eaſie a rate, as in the journey of Edom; were ſo far diſappointed of their expectation, that well they might ſuſpect all new aſſurance of good luck, when the old had thus beguiled them. All this notwithſtanding, their King that had ſtomack enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another David to winne it by the ſword. The iſſue of which fool-hardineſſe might eaſily have been fore-ſeen in humane reaſon; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the quality of their Armies, or the firſt and ominous beginning of the Warre. But meere humane wiſedome, howſoever it might foreſee much, could not have prognoſticated all the miſchief that fell upon Amazia. For as ſoon as the two Armies came in ſight, God, whoſe help this wretched man had ſo deſpiſed, did (as Joſephus reports it) ſtrike ſuch terrour and amazement into the men of Juda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their King to ſhift for himſelf; which he did ſo ill, that his enemy had ſoon caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into moſt abject baſeneſſe. That the Armie which fled, ſuſtained any other loſſe than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in Joſephus; it being likely that the ſoon beginning of their flight, which made it the more ſhamefull, made it alſo the more ſafe. But of the miſchiefe that followed this overthrow, it was Gods will that Amazia himſelfe ſhould ſuſtain the whole diſgrace. For Joas carried him directly to Jeruſalem, where he bade him procure that the gates might be opened to let him in and his Army; threatning him otherwiſe with preſent death. So much amazed was the miſerable captive, with theſe dreadfull words, that he durſt do no other than perſwade the Citizens, to yeeld themſelves to the mercie of the Conquerour. The Town, which afterwards being in weaker ſtate held out two years againſt Nebuchadnezzar, was utterly diſmaid, when the King that ſhould have given his life to ſave it, uſed all his force of command and intreaty to betray it. So the gates of Jeruſalem were opened to Joas, with which honour (greater than any King of Iſrael had ever obtained) he could not reſt contented, but the more to deſpiſe Amazia and his people, he cauſed 400 cubits of the wall to be thrown down, and entred the City in his Chariot through that breach, carrying the King before him as in triumph. This done, he ſack'd the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and ſo taking hoſtages of Amazia, he diſmiſſed the poor creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A diſcourſe of the reaſons hindring Joas from uniting Juda to the Crown of Iſrael, when he had won Jeruſalem, and held Amazia priſoner. The end of Joas his reign.

WE may juſtly marvell how it came to paſſe, that Joas, being thus in poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, having the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his own entire, could be ſo content to depart quietly with a little ſpoil, when he might have ſeized upon the whole Kingdome. The reign of Athalia had given him cauſe to hope that the iſſue of David might be diſpoſſeſſed of that crown; his own nobility, being the ſon and grand-child of Kings, together with the famous acts that he had done, were enough to make the people of Juda think highly of him; who might alſo have preferred his form of government before that of their own Kings, eſpecially at ſuch a time, when a long ſucceſſion of wicked Princes had ſmothered the thanks which were due to the memory of a few good ones. The commodity that would have enſued upon the union of all the twelve Tribes under one Prince, is ſo apparent, that I need not to inſiſt on it. That any meſſage from God forbade the Iſraelite (as afterwards in the victorie which Peka the ſon of Romelia got upon Ahaz) to turn his preſent advantage to the beſt uſe, we doe not read. All this makes it the more difficult to reſolve the queſtion, why a Prince ſo well exerciſed as Joas had been in recovering his own, and winning from the enemy, ſhould forſake the poſſeſſion of Jeruſalem, and wilfully neglect the poſſibilities, or rather caſt away the full aſſurance of ſo fair a conqueſt, as the Kingdome of Juda.

But concerning that point, which of all others had been moſt materiall, I mean the deſire of the vanquiſhed people to accept the Iſraelite for their King, it is plainly ſeen, that entring Jeruſalem in triumphant manner, Joas was unable to concoct his own proſperitie. For, the opening of the gates had been enough to have let him not onely into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by fair intreatie (eſpecially having ſure means of compulſion) hee might have made his own, when they ſaw themſelves betrayed, and baſely given away by him whoſe they had been before. The fair mark which this opportunitie preſented, hee did not aim at, becauſe his ambition was otherwiſe, and more meanly buſied, in levelling at the glory of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwards have been corrected well enough, if entring as an enemie, and ſhewing what hee could doe, by ſpending his anger upon the Walls, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and labored to ſhew good will to the inhabitants. But when his pride had done, his covetouſneſſe began, and ſought to pleaſe it ſelf with that which is commonly moſt ready to the ſpoyler, yet ſhould be moſt forborn. The Treaſure wherewith Seſac, Hazael, and the Philiſtims, men ignorant of the true God and his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirſt, ought not to have tempted the appetite of Joas, who though an Idolater, yet acknowledged also and worshipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem. Therefore when the people saw him take his way directly to seise that holy place,

Ch. 26. 15 and lay his ravenous hands upon the consecrated vessels, calling the familie of Obed Edom (whose children had hereditarie charge of the treasure) to a strict account, as if they had been officers of his own Exchequer; they considered him rather as an execrable Church-robber, than as a noble Prince, an Israelite, and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely avoyded; by stealing a few Apples, he lost the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a few dayes, might, by comparing themselves one to one, perceive his Souldiers to be no better than men of their own mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mightie town entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by unadvised fear. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recover their spirits, and begin to understand their first errour, they will think upon every advantage, of place, of provisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones; and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the evills grown out of their former cowardise, than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the bodie, which in such half-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be desired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weakneſſe of Peter de Medices, governing therin as a Prince, was reduced into such hard tearms, that it opened the gates unto the French King Charles the eighth, who not plainly professing himself either friend or foe to the State, entred the Town, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himself and his horse armed, with his lance upon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred between them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserve their libertie, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intollerable conditions, demanding huge summes of ready money, and the absolute Seigniorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, and tearing them before his face, bad him sound his Trumpets, and they would ring their Bels: which peremptory words made the French bethink themselves, and come readily to this agreement, that for forty thousand pounds, and not half of that money to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore whatsoever he had of their Dominion, and continue their assured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seem for that brave Armie, which in few monethes after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Foas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, usually drawes every Citizen to save his own, leaving victory to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolved, women can quench, as fast as the enemie, having other things to look unto, can set on fire. And indeed that Commander is more given to anger than regardfull of profit, who upon the uncertain hope of destroying a Town, forsakes the assurance of a good composition. Diversitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soever Foas might hold himself within Ierusalem, he could not easily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the armie of Iuda, which had bin more terrified than weakned in the late encounter, should re-enforce it self, and give him a check upon the way. Wherefore it was wisely done of him, to take hostages for his better securitie, his Armie being upon return, and better loaden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more unapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, serving to cool the ambition of Foas, and keep it down from aspiring to the Crown of Iuda; it appears that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisha the Prophet; who, when this Foas had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that hee should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred unto the fifth, sixth, and seventh yeares of Joas after which time, if any losses ensuing had blemished the former good successe, ill might the King of Israel have likened himself to a stately Cedar, and worse could he have esteemed the Judean one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battell, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his own. Seeing therefore it is made plain by the words of Elisha, that after three victories Joash should find some change of fortune, and suffer losse; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed upon him this yeare, it being the last of his Reign. That this was so, and that the Syrian, taking advantage of Joas his absence, gave such a blow to Israel, as the King at his return was not able to remedie, but rather fell himself into new misfortunes, which incressed the calamitie; we may evidently perceive in that which is spoken of Jeroboam his son. For it is said, That the Lord saw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Israel, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Israel from under the Heaven, he preserved them by the hand of Jeroboam the sonne of Joas. This is enough to prove, that the victorious Reign of Joas was concluded with a sad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastening his miserie and death, as they had done with Sesac, Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Crassus, and other sacrilegious Potentates.

Thus either through indignation conceived against him, by the people of Jerusalem, and courage which they took to set upon him within the Walls; or through preparation of the Armie that lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battell in open field, and recover by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought upon his own Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence (if not by all of these) Joas was driven to lay aside all thought of winning the kingdome of Juda, and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where he found a sad wel-come, and being utterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, forsook also his life in few moneths after, leaving his kingdome to Jeroboam the second, his fortunate and valiant son.

The end of Amazia his Reign and life.

ANy man is able to ghesse how Amazia looked, when the enemie had left him. Hee that had vaunted so much of his own great prowesse and skill in Armes, threatning to work wonders, and set up a-new the glorious Empire of David, was now uncased of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had been painted. Much argument of scoffing at him he had ministred unto such as held him in dislike, which at this time, doubtlesse were very many: for the shame that falls upon an insolent man, seldome failes of meeting with aboundance of reproach. As for Amazia (besides that the multitude are alwayes prone to lay the blame upon their Governours, even of those calamities which happen by their own default) there was no child in all Jerusalem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischief. He had not only challenged a good man of War, being himself a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemie, to have him let into the Citie, that with his own eyes he might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-say. The father of this Amazia was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites took him and tormented him, he did not offer to buy his own life at so dear a rate, as the Citie & Temple of Jerusalem. Had he offered, should they have made his promise good? surely the haste which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very unfortunate: for by keeping out the Israelites (which was easie enough) any little while, they should soone have bin rid of him, seeing that the Aramites would have made him run home, with greater speed than he came forth. Then also, when having trussed up his baggage, he was readie to be gone, a little courage would have served to perswade him to leave his load behind; had not their good King delivered up hostages, to secure his return, as loath to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken.

Such exprobrations could not but vex the heart of this unhappie King: it had been well for him, if they had made him acknowledge his fault unto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that he continued an Idolater to the very last. For it is said of him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Jerusalem: a manifest proofe 2 Chro. 25. 27.

proof that he was not reclaimed unto his lives end. And certainly, they which tell a man in his adversity of his faults passed, shall sooner be thought to upbraid him with his fortune, than to seeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no marvell, that Priests and Prophets were lesse welcome to him, than ever they had been. On the other side, flatterers, and such as were desirous to put a heart into him, whereof themselves might alwaies be masters, wanted not plausible matter to revive him. For he was not the first, nor second of the Kings of Juda, that had been overcome in battell: David himselfe had abandoned the Citie, leaving it before the enemy was in sight, unto Absalom his rebellious Sonne. Many besides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Joas might so easily have beene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Sesac in? Asa was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his own hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excusable by necessity of the time. Belike these traducers would commend no Actions, but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather live to punish them, than die to please them. Though wherein had hee given them any cause of displeasure? It was he indeed that commanded to set open the gates to Joas; but it was the people that did it. Good servants ought not to have obeyed their Masters Commandements to his disadvantage, when they saw him not master of his own Person. As his captivity did acquit him from blame of all things that he did or suffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his losse. For had he beene as hasty to flye as others were, hee might have escaped as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base multitude courage by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom he trusted. Unworthy creatures, that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans words, being prisoner, he commanded them to yeeld; having neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he had them stand to it and fight like men. The best was, that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lives were saved: the enemy having wisely preferred the surprise of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Army of Stags that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perswade him, that it was even so indeed. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was unwilling to ascribe unto God the good successe fore-told by a Prophet, could easily find how to impute this late disaster unto fortune, and the fault of others. Now concerning fortune, it seemes that he meant to keep himself safe from her by sitting still; for in fifteene years following (so long he out-lived his honour) we find not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth bee recorded of his government, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spent among them, increasing their hatred to his own ruine. He that suspecteth his own worth or other mens opinions, thinking the lesse regard is had of his person than he beleeveth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie in purchasing the name of a severe man. For the affected sowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the gravity of one that is wise: and the feare wherein they live, which are subject unto oppression, carryes a shew of reverence to him that does the wrong; at least it serves to dazle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weakednesse of such as have jurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well using it, men might attain to be such as they ought, they do usually mis-spend, in seeking to appeare such as they are not. This is a vain & deceivable course, procuring, in stead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous consequence; especially when an unable spirit, being over-perted with so high authority, is too passionate in the execution of such an office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therfore Amazia thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did he else than strive to make the people think he hated them, when of themselves they were apt enough to beleeve that he did not love them? the best was, that he had, by revenging his fathers death provided well enough for his own security: but who should take vengeance (or upon whom?) of such a murther, wherein every one had a part? Surely God himself, who had not given cōmandement or leave unto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the bloud of his Annointed. Yet as Amazia carelesse of God, was carried headlong by his own affections; so his subjects, following the same ill example, without requiring what belonged unto their duties, rose up against him, with such headlong furie, that being unable to defend himself in Jerusalem, he was driven to forsake the Citie, and flie to Lachis, for safeguard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceived against him, & so generall, that neither his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrie abroad procure friends to defend his life. Questionlesse he chose the Town of Lachis for his refuge, as a place of all other best affected to him; yet found he there none other favour, than that the people did not kil him with their own hands, for when the Conspirators (who troubled not themselves about raising an Armie for the matter) sent pursuers after, he was abandoned to death. Lachis was the utmost Citie of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Juda; so that he might have made an easie escape (if he durst adventure into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Israel. Therefore it may seem that he was detained there, where certain it is that he found no kind of favour: for had not the people of this Town added their own treason to the generall insurrection; the murderers could not at so good leasure as they did, have carried away his bodie to Jerusalem, where they gave him buriall with his fathers.

§. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of Juda, after the death of Amazia.

IT hath alreadie bin shewed, that the Reignes of the Kings of Juda and Israel were sometimes to be measured by compleat years, otherwhiles, by years current: and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last years of his fathers Reign, or the foremost of his sons. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crown of Juda lay voyd eleven whole yeares: a thing not plainly set down in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Josephus, and therefore hard to be beleeved, were it not proved by necessary consequence.

Twice we find it written, that Amazia, King of Juda, lived after the death of Joas King of Israel fifteen yeares; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazia, was about the end of fifteen yeares compleat, which Jeroboam the second (who in the fifteenth year of Amazia was made King over Israel) had reigned in Samaria. But the succession of Uzzias, who is also called Azaria, unto his father in the Kingdome of Juda, was eleven years later than the sixteenth of Jeroboam: for it is expressed, that Azaria began to reign in the seven and twentieth yeare of Jeroboam; the sixteenth yeare of his life, being joyned with the first of two and fiftie that he reigned. So the Interregnum of eleven yeares cannot be divided, without some hard means used, of interpreting the Text otherwise than the letter sounds.

2 Chro. 25. 2. & 2 Kin. 14. 17.
2 Kin. 14. 23.
2 Kin. 15. 1.

Yet some conjectures there are made, which tend to keep all even, without acknowledging any voyd time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the seven and twentieth yeare of Jeroboam, we should perhaps understand the seven and twentieth yeare of his life; or else (because the like words are no where else interpreted in the like sense) that Azaria was eleven yeares under age, that is, five years old, when his father died, and so his sixteenth yeare might concurre with the seven and twentieth of Jeroboam; or that the Text it selfe might have suffered some wrong, by miswriting twentie seven for seventeen yeares; and so, by making the seventeenth yeare of Jeroboam to be newly begun, all may be salved. These are the conjectures of that worthy man Gerard Mercator: concerning the first of which, it may suffice, that the Author himself doth easily let it passe, as improbable, the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that upon every doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be falsified in all copies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his Reign being five yeares old; but then must we adde those eleven yeares which passed in his minoritie, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth yeare, which is all one, in a maner, with allowing an Interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to avoyd an Interregnum in Juda, seeing that the like necessitie neceſſity hath inforced all good Writers to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeares, in the kingdome of Iſrael: The ſpace of time betweene Jeroboams death, and the beginning of Zacharias reign, and ſuch another gap found between the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hoſeo, have made it eaſily to be admitted into Samaria; which the conſideration of things as they ſtood in Juda, when Amazia was ſlaine, doth make more probable to have happened there, yea, although the neceſſity of computation were not ſo apparent.

For the publike furie having ſo farre extended it ſelfe, as unto the deſtruction of the kings own perſon, was not likely to be appeaſed without order taken for obtaining ſome redreſſe of thoſe matters, which had cauſed it at the firſt to break forth into ſuch extremity. We need not therefore wonder how it came to paſſe, that they which already had thrown themſelves into ſuch an horrible treaſon, ſhould afterwards dare to withhold the Crown from a Prince of that age, which being inveſted in all ornaments of Regality, is nevertheleſſe expoſed to many injuries, proceeding from head-ſtrong, and forgetfull ſubjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have beene King but one and tonie years after he came out of his non-age; I dare not allow it, becauſe it agrees too harſhly with the Text. The beſt opinion were that which gives unto Jeroboam eleven yeares of reigne with his Father, before he began to reigne ſingle in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not ſwallow up almoſt the whole reign of Joas, and extending the years of thoſe which reigned in Iſrael (by making ſuch of them compleat as were onely current) and take in the ſhorteſt the reignes of Princes ruling in other Nations. But I will not ſtand to diſpute further of this: every man may follow his own opinion, and ſee mine more plainely in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for theſe purpoſes.

§. XII.

Of Princes Contemporarie with Amazia, and more particularly of Sardanapalus.

THe Princes living with Amazia, and in the eleven years that followed his death, were Joas and Jeroboam in Iſrael; Cephrenes and Mycerinus in Egypt; Sylvius Alladius, and Sylvius Aventinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedæmon Theleclus, in whoſe time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Geranthe, Amyclæ, and ſome other Townes.

But more notable than all theſe, was Aſſyrian Sardanapalus, who in the one and twentieth year of Amazia, ſucceeding his father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, reigned twenty yeares, and was ſlaine the laſt of the eleven voyd yeares which fore-went the reigne of Azaria. In him ended (as moſt agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thouſand two hundred and forty years. A moſt luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, paſſing away his time among ſtrumpets, whom he imitated both in apparrel and behaviour.

In theſe voluptuous courſes he lived an unhappy life, knowing himſelfe to be ſo vile, that he durſt not let any man have a ſight of him; yet ſeene he was at length, and the ſight of him was ſo odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who governed Media under him, finding meanes to behold the perſon of his King, was ſo incenſed with that beaſtly ſpectacle of a man diſguiſed in womans attire, and ſtriving to counterfeit an harlot, that he thought it a great ſhame to live under the command of ſo unworthy a creature. Purpoſing therefore to free himſelfe and others from ſo baſe ſubjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Beleſis or Beloſus a Chaldæan, who told him plainly, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus ſhould fall into his hands. Arbaces well pleaſed with the prophecie, did promiſe unto Beloſus himſelfe the government of Babylon; and ſo concluding how to handle the buſineſſe, one of them ſtirred up the Medes, and allured the Perſians into the quarrel, the other perſwaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themſelves in the ſame cauſe. Theſe foure Nations armed forty thouſand men againſt Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himſelfe, but gathering ſuch forces as he could out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deeds refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, anſwer to the manner of his retiredneſſe. For in three battels battells he carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearfull straits, that had not Belesus promised them constantly some unexpected succours, they would forthwith have broken up their Camp. About the same time, an Armie out of Bactria was comming to assist the King; but Arbaces encountring it upon the way, perswaded so strongly by promise of liberty, that those forces joyned themselves with his. The sudden departure of the enemie seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victory. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came upon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through over-great security was unprepared for resistance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his wives brother Salamenus to keep the field, he withdrew himself into the Citie of Nineve; which, till new aydes that he sent for should come, he thought easily to defend; it having been prophesied, that Nineve should never be taken, till the River were enemy to the Town. Of the greatnesse and strength of Nineve, enough hath been spoken in our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battels overthrown the Kings Armie; and slain Salamenus) was fain to lye two whole years before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet hee saw no appearance. It seems that hee wanted Engines and skill to force those walls, which were an hundred foot high, and thick enough for three Chariots in front to passe upon the rampire. But that which hee could not doe in two years, the River of Tigris did in the third: for being high swolne with raines, it not onely drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw down twenty furlongs of the wall, and made a fair breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, either terrified with the accomplishment of the old Oracle, or seeing no means of resistance left, shutting up himself into his Palace, with his Wives, Eunuches, and all his Treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith he and they were together consumed. Strabo speaks of a monument of his, that was in Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription shewing that he built that Citie and Tharsus upon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding men eat and drink, and make merry, encouraged others with verses well known, to a voluptuous life, by his own example testified that his nature was more prone to sensualitie, than to any vertue beseeming a Prince. Strab. l. 14.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when he first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly he slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of writers agrees with this relation of Diodorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greek Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best be known. Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 9.

Concerning the Princes which reigned in Assyria, from the time of Semiramis, unto Sardanapalus, though I believe that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius hath it, incessantly) busied in offensive, or else defensive arms; yet for the most part of them I do better trust Diodorus Siculus, who saith that their names were overpassed by Ctesias, because they did nothing worthy of memorie. Whatsoever they did, that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath said of them is very true; Silence and Oblivion hath oppressed them. Diod. l. 2. c. 8. Theophilus Antiochenus l. 3.

Of Uzzia.

§. I.

The prosperitie of Uzzia, and of Jeroboam the second, who reigned with him in Israel. Of the Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes after the death of Jeroboam. Of Zacharia, Sallum, Menahem, and Pekahia.

UZzia, who is also called Ahazia, the son of Jotham, was made King of Juda, when he was sixteen years old, in the seven and twentieth year of Jeroboam the son of Joas King of Israel. Hee served the God of his father David, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth, a Town that stood neer to the Red Sea, and restored it to Juda. He overcame the Philistims, of whose Towns he dismantled some, and built others in sundrie parts of their Territories. Also he got the masterie over some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous wars, wherein (as Josephus rehearseth his acts) he began with the Philistims, and then proceeded unto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seven thousand men of war,
2 Chro. 26.14 over which were appointed two thousand and six hundred Captains. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and speares, and helmets, and other Arms requisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite unto that which some of his late predecessours had held, who thought it better policie to use the service of the Nobilitie, than 2 Chro. 21.9. of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes, and all the Chariots.

As the victories of Uzzia were far more important, than the atchievments of all that had reigned in Juda, since the time of David; so were his riches and magnificent works, equall, if not superiour to any of theirs that had been Kings between him and Salomon. For, besides that great conquests are won to repay the charges of War with triple interest, he had the skill to use, as well as the happinesse to get. Hee turned his lands to the best use, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient for such husbandrie. In other places he had Cattell feeding, whereof he might well keep great store, having won so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had abundance of waste ground serving for pasturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardsmen, hee built Towers in the wildernesse. He also digged many Cisterns or Ponds. Josephus calls them water-courses; but in such drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towers he so commanded the water, that none could without his consent, relieve themselves therewith, questionlesse he took the onely course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship over all the wildernesse; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the use of Travellers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundrie Towns among the Philistims; he repaired the wall of Jerusalem, which Joas had broken down, and fortified it with Towers, whereof some were an hundred and fiftie Cubits high.

The state of Israel did never so flourish, as at this time, since the division of the twelve Tribes into two kingdomes. For as Uzzia prevailed in the South, so (if not more) Jeroboam the son of Joas, King of the ten Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories against the Syrians, he won the Royall Citie of Damascus, and 2 Kin. 14.25. 28. he won Hamath, with all the countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wildernesse, that is, (as the most expound it) unto the vast desarts of Arabia, the end whereof was undiscovered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in time of this Jeroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had bin in the reign of David.

But

But it was not for the piety of Jeroboam, that he thrived so well, for he was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitter affliction whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the succession of war, and to throw the victorious Aramites under the feet of those whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Jehu to which God had promised the Kingdome of Israel unto the fourth generation, was now not far from the end; and now again it was invited unto repentance by new benefits, as it hath been at the beginning. But the sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat was held so pretious, that neither the kingdome it self given to him by God, was able to draw Jehu from that politick Idolatry; nor the misery falling upon him and his posterity, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperity of Jeroboam the son of Joas, to make him render the honour that was due to the onely giver of victory. Wherefore the promise of God made unto Jehu, that his sons, unto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but being almost expired, gave warning of the approaching end, by an accident (so strange, that we who find no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occasions) foregoing the last accomplishment. 1 Reg. 16. 13.

When Jeroboam the son of Joas, after a victorious reign of one and forty years, had ended his life; it seems in all reason that Zacharia his son should forthwith have been admitted to reign in his stead; the Nobility of that race having gotten such a lustre by the immediate succession of four Kings, that any Competitor, had the Crown passed by election, must needs have appeared base; and the vertue of the last King having been so great, as might well serve to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the already confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this notwithstanding, two or three and twenty years did passe before Zacharia the sonne of Jeroboam was, by uniforme consent, received as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel, where the golden Calves did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance are likely not to have been wanting, upon which the wisdome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captains of the army (who afterwards slew one another so fast, that in fourteen years there reigned five Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rend the kingdome asunder, holding each what hee could, and either despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; untill, after many years, wearied with dissention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quietly to the son of Jeroboam. That this Anarchy lasted almost three and twenty years, we find by the difference of time between the fifteenth year of Uzzia, which was the last of Jeroboam his one and fortieth (his seven and twentieth concurring with the first of Uzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Uzzia, in the last six moneths whereof Zacharia reigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Jeroboam to have reigned with his father eleven years, do cut off the interregnum in Juda (before mentioned) and by the same reason abridge this Anarchie that was before the reign of Zacharia in Israel. Yet they leave it twelve years long: which is time sufficient to prove that the kingdome of the ten Tribes was no lesse distempered than as is already noted. But I choose rather to follow the more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes reigning abroad in the World, than this doubtfull conjecture, that gives to Jeroboam two and fifty years, by adding three quarters of his fathers reign unto his own; which was it self indeed so long, that he may well seem to have begun it very young: for I do not think that God blessed this Idolater both with a longer reign, and with a longer life than he did his servant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time wherein the Throne of Israel was voyd, before the reign of Zacharia; little may suffice to be said of his reign it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Six moneths only was he King; in which time hee declared himself a worshipper of the golden Calves; which was enough to justifie the judgement of God, whereby he was slain. He was the last of Jehu's house, being (inclusively) the first of that line; which may have been some cause of the troubles impeaching his orderly succession: the prophesie having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (besides that Gods promise was extended unto the utmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum, or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had been given to Jehu for the slaughter of Jehoram, and for the eradication of Ahabs house.

Zacharia

Zacharia having been six moneths a King, was then slain by Sallum, who reigned af-
2 Kin. 15.13. ter him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not find; save onely that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one Jabesh, whereby his father got no honour. It seems that he was one of those, who in time of faction, had laboured for himself; and now when all other Competitors were sitten down, thought came to prevail against that King, in whose person the race of Jehu was to fall. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong partie; for Tiphsah or Thapsa, and the coast thereof even from Tirzah, where Menahem his enemie and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallum received the reward of his treason, and was slain by Menahem who reigned in his place.

Menahem the son of Gadi, reigned after Sallum ten years. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: for he not onely destroyed Tiphsah, and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript up all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this cruelty been used in revenge of Zacharia death, it is like that hee would have been as earnest, in procuring unto him his Fathers Crown when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was used such long deliberation, that we may plainly discover Ambition, Disdain, and other private passions, to have been the causes of this beastly outrage.

In the time of Menahem, and (as it seems) in the beginning of his Reign, Pul King of Assyria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appeased, with a thousand talents of silver, levied upon all the substantiall men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not onely the peace of his Kingdome, but his own establishment therein: some factious man (belike) having either invited Pul thither, or (if Jos. ant. l. 9. 11 he came uncalled) sought to use his help, in deposing this ill-beloved King. Josephus reports of this Menahem, that his reign was no milder than his entrance. But after ten years, his tyrannie ended with his life: and Pekahia his Sonne occupied his room.

Of this Pekahia the story is short: for he reigned onely two years; at the end whereof, hee was slain by Peka the sonne of Remalia, whose treason was rewarded with the Crown of Israel, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himself shall be.
Jos. ibid. There needs no more to be said of Menahem and his sonne, save that they were both of them Idolaters; and the son (as we find in Josephus) like to his father in cruelty. Concerning Pul the Assyrian King, who first opened unto those Northern Nations the way into Palestina; it will shortly follow in order of the Story, to deliver our opinion: whether he were that Belesus (called also Beleses, and by some Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that we relate the end of Uzzia's life, who out-lived the happinesse wherein we left him.

§. II.

The end of Uzzia his Reign and Life.

AS the zeal of Jehojada that godly Priest was the mean to preserve the linage of David in the person of Joas, so it appears, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Uzzia, to bring him up and advance him to the Crown of Juda, when the hatred borne to his Father Amazia had endangered his succession. For it is said of Chro. 2 26.5. Uzzia, That he sought God in the dayes of Zecharia (which understood the visions of God, and when as he sought the Lord, God made him prosper.

Verse 16. But, when he was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for hee transgressed against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burn incense upon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his own authority, by medling in the Priests office, whose power had in every extremity been so helpfull to the Kings of Juda, that meere gratitude and civill policy, should have held back Uzzia from incroaching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had been silent in this case, and not forbidding it. Howsoever, the King forgot his duty, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgat not to assist them. Azaria the high Priest interrupted the Kings purpose, and gave him to understand how little to his honour it would prove, that hee took upon him the office of the sons of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourscore other Priests, valiant men, but their their valour was shewed onely in assisting the high Priest, when (according to his dutie) he reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himself performed. We find in Josephus, that the King had apparelled himself in Priestly habit, and that he threatned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, unlesse they would be quiet. Josephus indeed inlargeth the Storie, by inserting a great Earth-quake, which did teat down half an Hill, that rowled four furlongs, till it rested against another Hill, stopping up the high-wayes, and spoyling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth-quake, he saith, that the roof of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sunbeam did light upon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprosie. All this may have been true; and some there are who think that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos, wherein they do much mis-reckon the times. For the Earth-quake spoken of by Amos, was in the dayes of Jeroboam King of Israel, who dyed seven and thirtie years before Uzzia; so that Jotham the son of Uzzia, which supplied his Fathers place in government of the Land, should, by this accompt, have but then unborne: for he was but five and twenty years old, when he began to reign as king. Therefore, thus far only we have assurance, that while Uzzia was wroth with the Priests, the leprosie rose up in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, in all haste, to depart the place, and to live in a house by himself untill he dyed, the rule over the Kings house, and over all the Land, being committed to Jotham, his Son and Successour. Jotham took not upon him self the stile of a King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherin his Ancestors lay interred; yet in a Monument apart from the rest, because he was a Leper. Josephus Antiq. l. 9. c. 11. 2 Chro. 26. 20.

§. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of Uzzia; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

IN the time of Uzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadias and Jonas. It is not indeed set down, when Joel or Obadias did prophecie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to be ranged (according to Saint Hieromes rule) with the next before them, then must these two be judged contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who lived under King Uzzia. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least, a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath so painfully been sought, without reprehension, how can he be taxed, which offers to search out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seems to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Jonas, who foretold the great victories of Jeroboam King of Israel, and therefore is like to have prophesied in the dayes of Joas, whilest the affliction of Israel was exceeding bitter; the Text it self intimating no lesse: by which consequence he was elder than the other Prophets, whose works are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Israel are now lost. That which remaineth of him, seems, not without reason unto some very learned, to have belonged unto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes Nineve was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse promises of the Messias. 2 Chr. c. 14. v. 25. 26.

In the reign of Uzzia likewise it was, that Esay, the first of the four great Prophets, began to see his visions. This difference of great and lesser Prophets, is taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustine gives reason of the distinction) because the greater have written larger Books. The Prophet Esay was great indeed, not only in regard of his much writing, or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who think him to have been the son of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellencie both of his stile and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Saviour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that he might as well be called an Evangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wise, That (as Hierome saith) one would think he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Historie of matters already past. Aug. de civit. Dei. l. 18. c. 19. Hier. in præf. super Isaiam.

Bocchoris was King of Egypt, and the ninth year of his reign, by our computation (where(wherof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Uzzia took possession of the Kingdome of Juda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Asychis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt: unto him succeeded Amysis; and these two occupied that Crown six years. Then Sabacus, an Æthiopian, became King of Egypt, and held it fifty years, whereof the ten first ranne along with the last of Uzzia his Reign and Life. Of these and other Egyptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affairs shall come to be intermedled with the businesse of Juda.

In Athens, the two last years of Ariphron his twentie, the seven and twentieth of Thespeius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and the three first of Æschylus his three and twentie, made even with the two and fiftie of Uzzia; as likewise did in Alba the last seven of Silvius Aventinus his seven and thirtie, together with the three and twentie of Silvius Brucus, and two and twentie the first of Silvius Amulius. In Media Arbaces began his new kingdome in the first of Uzzia, wherein, after eight and twentie years, his son Sosarmus succeeded him, and reigned thirty years. Of this Arbaces, and the devision of the Assyrian Empire, between him and others, when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to use more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great uncertaintie in the storie of the Assyrian kings, who have already found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to forget it.

§. IV.

Of the Assyrian Kings, descending from Phul: and whether Phul and Belosus were one person, or heads of sundrie Families, that reigned a part in Nineve and Babylon.

BY that which hath formerly been shewed of Sardanapalus his death, it is apparent, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Medyan; to whom the rest of the Confederates did not onely submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to be judged by him, receiving by his authority sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lives. The first example of this his power, was shown upon Belsus the Babylonian, by whose especiall advice and help, Arbaces himself was become so great: Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannicall a manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, either to the Princes that had assisted him, or to the generalitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belesas, he used the counsell of his other Captains, and then pardoned him of his own grace; allowing him to hold not only the City and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezelling whereof his life had been endangered.

In like manner, he gave rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Provinces; retaining (as it appears) onely the Soveraignty to himselfe, which to use immoderately hee did naturally abhorre. He is said, indeed, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding unto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, he destroyed the Citie of Nineve, permitting the Citizens nevertheless to take and carry away every one his own goods. The other Nations that joyned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of liberty; which he himselfe so greatly loved, that by slacking too much the reines of his own Soveraignty, hee did more harm to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territory of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanassar, (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee find in the Scriptures to have held some Towns of the Medes; and the civill administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to see that reformation, which Deioces the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Assyrians grew to bee such as might in fourscore years, if not sooner, both extend it self unto the conquest of Israel, and tear away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Nineve, and subversion of the Assyrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes, under Arbaces, had the honour, who may seem at that time to have kept the Assyrians under their subjection, when the rest of the Provinces were set at liberty; but in consideration of the Kings themselves, who who reigning afterwards in Babylon and Nineve, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their History is made uncertain.

I will first therefore deliver the opinion generally received, and the grounds whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it, I will compare together the determination of that worthy man Joseph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Antients in this doubtfull case. Neither shall it be needfull to set down a-part the several authorities and arguments of sundry men, adding somwhat of weight or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse: which I will do as briefly as I can, and without fear to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancie of mine own, but meerely led by those reasons, which upon examination of each part, seemed to me most forcible, though to others they may perhaps appear weak.

That which, untill of late, hath passed as current, is this; That Belosus was the same King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palestina with an Armie; being called Pul, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his authors with such as follow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is said, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Babylon by composition made with Arbaces; and that not therewith content, hee got into his hand part of Assyria: finally that he reigned eight and fortie years, and then dying, left the Kingdome to Teglat-phalassar his sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Merodach prevailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proof, could not be gainsaid: for that Author (such as he is) is peremptorie herein. But, howsoever Annius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason, that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintain this Tradition, justifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authors, and repugnant unto no historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus (which is indeed the foundation whereupon all have built) that Arbaces and Belasus were partners in the action against Sardanapalus; and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captains were with governments: but that any third person was so eminent, as to have Assyria it self, the chiefe Countrey of the Empire bestowed upon him, it is a thing whereof not the least appearance is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should be committed unto a peculiar King, at such time as it was not thought meete to trust them in their own walls and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Nineve by Arbaces, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policy, because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept down from aspiring to recover the Soveraignty, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, unto the Seat of the Empire.

Upon such considerations did the Romanes, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage, and dissolve the Corporation, or Body politick, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Towns were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed over-dangerous, even to Rome it selfe, that was Mistresse of them both. This being so, how can it be thought that the Assyrians in three or four years had erected their Kingdome a-new, under one Pul? or what must this Pul have been (of whose deservings or entermedling, or indeed of whose very name, we find no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall parts of the Empire fell, either by generall consent in division of the Provinces, or by his own power and purchase very soon after? Surely he was none other than Belosus; whose neer neighbour-hood gave him oportunity (as he was wise enough to play his own game) both to get Assyria to himself, and to empeach any other man that should have attempted to seize upon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belosus held, being (as Herodotus reports) in riches and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not enough, he had gotten into his own hands all the gold and silver that had been in the Palace of Nineve. And question lesse, to restore such a Citie as Nineve was an enterprise for no none to take in hand, except he had such means as Belosus had; which Pul, if he were not Belosus, is likely to have wanted.

Besides all this, had Pul been a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assyria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have been an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, seeking bootie a farre off in Israel: the onely action by which the name of Phul is known. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was the same whom prophane writers have called Belosus, Beleses, and Belesis, (in like manner as Josephus acknowledgeth, that he, whom the Scriptures called never otherwise than Darius the Mede, was the sonne of Astiages, and called of the Greeks by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple utterly removed. For Babylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palestina: so that Belosus having settled his affairs in Assyria towards the East and North, might with good leasure encroach upon the Countries that lay on the other side of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that looks into all particulars, may find every one circumstance concurring, to prove that Phul, who invaded Israel, was none other than Belosus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrown, did enter into that action, meerly for the love of Belosus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of main importance, to those that were to passe over Euphrates with an Armie into Syria. Wherefore Belosus, that held good correspondence with them, and whose most fruitfull Province, adjoyning to their barrain quarters, might yearly doe them inestimable pleasures, was not onely likely to have quiet passage through their borders, but their utmost assistance: yea, it stands with good reason, that they who loved not Israel, should for their own behoofe have given him intelligence of the destruction and civill broyles among the ten Tribes; whereby as this Pul got a thousand talents, so it seems that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavie neighbour of Jeroboam, recovered their own, setting up a new King in Damasco, and clearing the coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamath) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neither was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations, divided by Euphrates, hold together in so good termes of friendship: it was antient consanguinitie, the memorie whereof was available to the Syrians, in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the river came over willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belosus had good reason to look into those parts: what a King reigning so far off as Nineve, should have to do in Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to shew.

Jos. ant. l. 10. c. 12.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldaans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seem to have ill coherence with that which hath been said of the long Anarchie that was in the ten Tribes. For if the Crown of Israel were worn by no man in three and twenty years, then is it likely that Belosus was either unwilling to stir, or unable to take the advantage, when it was fairest, and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough to seek after help from some Prince that lay further off, and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belosus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belosus did passe the river of Euphrates, as soon as he found likelihood of making a prosperous journey, then may it seem that the inter-regnum in Israel was not so long as we have made it: for three and twenty years leasure would have afforded better opportunitie, which ought not to have been lost.

For answer hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they layd hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they prevailed and grew mighty, between the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Mede. Now, though it be held an errour of Orosius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldaans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein he and Eusebius doe concurre, that the authoritie of Arbaces did restrain the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull onely of it selfe. Now, though some have conjectured that all Assyria was given to Belosus (as an overplus, besides the Provinces of Babylon which was his by plain bargain made aforehand) in regard of his high deservings; yet the opinion more commonly received, is, that hee did onely incroach upon that Province by little and little, whilest Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there passed but twelve years between the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Menahem his Reign; manifest it is, that the conquest of Assyria, and settling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belosus occupyed, besides the restauration of Nineve, which alone was able to take up all the time remaining of his reign, if perhaps he lived to see it finished in his own dayes. So that this argument may rather serve to prove that Phul and Belosus were one person; forasmuch as the journey of Phul against Israel was not made untill Belosus could find leasure; and the time of advantage which Belosus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely, in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may be said, that he who conquered Assyria, and performed somewhat upon a Country so far distant as Palæstina, was likely to have been, at least, named in some History, or, if not himself, yet his Country to have been spoken of for those victories: but we neither hear of Phul, in any prophane Author; neither doth any Writer, sacred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts whatsoever of the Assyrians, done in those times; whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldaans, we find good Record.

Surely, that great slaughter of so many thousand Assyrians, in the quarrell of Sardanapalus, together with other calamities of that long and unfortunate warre, which overwhelmed the whole Country, not ending but with the ruine and utter desolation of Nineve, must needs have so weakened the state of Assyria, that it could not in thirty years space be able to invade Palæstina, which the antient Kings, reigning in Ninive, had, in all their greatnesse, forborn to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did help to enable Belosus to subdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Medes) by the interposition of that Countrey, secure of the Scythians, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turn Southward, and try his fortune in those Kingdomes, whereinto civill dissention of the inhabitants, and the bordering envie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, Friends and Cousins to the Chaldaans and Mesopotamians, did invite him. For these, and the other before alleged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be understood of Belosus; even as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artaxaxat, and Ahashuerosh, with the like, are thought, or known, to be meant the same whom prophane Historians, by names better known in their own Countreys, have called Nabopollassar, Cyaxares, and Astyages: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath been written of old, nor need to trouble our selves and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they allege in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted, other things of more importance will of themselves easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of this point (considering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belosus, or some other man: the whole race of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kings, wherein are found those famous Princes, Nabonassar, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollassar (famous for the Astronomicall observations recorded from their times) is the main ground of this contention. If therefore Belosus or Beleses were that Phul which invaded Israel; if he and his posterity reigned both in Nineve and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phul-Asar, from whom Salmanasar, Senacherib, and Asarhaddon descended; then it is manifest, that we must seek Nabonassar the Babylonian King, among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other than Salmanasar, who is known to have reigned in those years which Ptolomy the Mathematician hath assigned unto Nabonassar. As for Merodech, who supplanted Asar-haddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintain the contrary part, will not be satisfied with such conjectures. They lay hold upon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to overthrow all the premisses upon which it is inferred. For (say they) if Nabonassar that reigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanasar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belosus were severall Kings. This consequence is so plain, that it needs no confirmation. To prove that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanasar, are brought such arguments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworn to hold the contrary. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Assyria. This is proved by his name, which is meerly Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanassars name, is proper to the Assyrians.

It is likewiſe proved by the Aſtronomicall obſervations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Aſſyrians, do ſhew that Nabonaſſar, from whom Ptolomy draws that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Aſſyrian. Thirdly, and more ſtrongly, it is confirmed by the ſucceſſor of Nabonaſſar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his own language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefly in Eſay his prophecie, Merodac, by the former part of his name; or Merodach Baladan the ſon of Baladan. Now if Merodach the ſon of Baladan King of Babel were the ſonne of Nabonaſſar, then was Nabonaſſar none other than Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanaſſar King of Aſſyria.

What can be plainer? As for the cadence of theſe two names, Nabonaſſar and Salmanaſſar, which in Greek or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinity therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanaſſar carryed captive ſome part of the ten Tribes: it may well be granted, that in the Province of Babylon, Salmanaſſar had gotten ſomewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it ſelfe. To conclude, Merodach began his reign over Babylon in the ſixt year of Hezekia, at which time Salmanaſſar took Samaria, therefore if Salmanaſſar were King of Babylon, then muſt we ſay that he and Merodach, yea, and Nabonaſſar, were all one man. Theſe are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Joſeph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion founded upon likelihood of conjectures, hath drawn his proofes from matter of more neceſſary inference.

Touching all that was ſaid before of Phul Beloſus, for the proving that Phul and Beloſus were not ſundry Kings; Joſeph Scaliger pities their ignorance, that have ſpent their labour to ſo little purpoſe. Honeſt and painfull men he confeſſeth that they were, who by their diligence might have won the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, given ſuch offence, that men refuſed thereupon to read their Books and Chronologies. A ſhort anſwer.

For mine own part, howſoever I beleeve nothing that Annius his Beroſus, Metaſthenes, and others of that ſtamp affirm, in reſpect of their bare authority; yet am I not ſo ſqueamiſh, but that I can well enough digeſt a good Book, though I find the names of one or two of theſe good fellows alleged in it: I have (ſomewhat peradventure too often) already ſpoken my mind of Annius his Authors: Nevertheleſſe, I may ſay here again, that where other Hiſtories are ſilent, or ſpeak not enough, there may we without ſhame borrow of theſe, as much as agrees with that little which elſewhere we find, and ſerveth to explain or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeed are thoſe honeſt and painfull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I miſtake him not, good ſilly fellowes) who ſet down the Aſſyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords alſo of Babylon, taking Pul for Beloſus, and Salmanaſſar for Nabonaſſar, ſuch Writers as a man ſhould be aſhamed or unwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annius, though diſliking him in generall) Gerard Mercator is not ſo ſlight a Chronologer, that he ſhould be laughed out of doores with the name of an honeſt meaning fellow.

But I will not make compariſons between Scaliger and Mercator; they were both of them men notably learned: let us examine the arguments of Scaliger, and ſee whether they be of ſuch force as cannot either be reſiſted or avoyded. It will eaſily be granted, that Nabonaſſar was King of Babylon; that he was not King of Aſſyria, ſome men doubt whether Scaligers reaſons be enough to prove. For though Nabonaßar be a Chaldaan name, and Salmanaßar an Aßyrian; yet what hinders us from beleeving that one man in two languages might be called by two ſeverall names? That Aſtronomy flouriſhed among the Chaldees, is not enough to prove Nabonaßar either an Aſtrologer or a Chaldaan. So it is, that Scaliger himſelfe calls them, Prophetas neſcio quos, qui Nabonaſſarum Aſtronomum fuiße in ſomnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who, that in their ſleep have dreampt of Nabonaſſar, that he was an Aſtrologer.

Whether Nabonaßar were an Aſtrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintain the negative. But as his being Lord over the Chaldaans, doth not prove him to have been learned in their ſciences; ſo doth it not prove him not to have been alſo King of Aßyria. The Emperour Charles the fift, who was born in Gant, and Philip his ſonne, King of Spain, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences, Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, than were any that I read of then living in Spain, if Spain at that time had any; yet I think, Posteritie will not use this as an argument, to prove that Spain was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmanassar or Nabonassar did use the Assyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Scholars; but it seems, that he and his posteritie, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued, as likewise king Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazzard all the Netherlands, by such a course. As for the two un-answerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me-thinks none other than answers to somewhat that is or might be alleged on the contrary side) one of them which is drawn from the unlike sound and writing of those names, Salmanassar and Nabonassar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is not likenesse of sound, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmanassar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it self: this indeed might be so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto there is nothing save conjecture. But in that which is alleged out of the Prophet Esay concerning Merodach the son of Baladan; and in that which is said of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to reign in the sixt year of Hezekia, I find matter of more difficultie, than can be answered in haste. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections untill I meet with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach lived, and was King. Yet that I may not leave too great a scruple in the mind of the Reader, thus farre will I here satisfie him; that how strong soever this argument may seem, Scaliger himselfe did live to retract it, ingenuously confessing, that in thinking Merodach to be the son of Nabonassar, he had been deceived.

Now therefore let us consider, in what sort they have fashioned their Storie, who taking Pul to be a distinct person from Belosus or Belestis, have in like sort, as was necessarie, distinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to fail in Asarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse my want of Books, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present unto us the body of this Historie, in one view. Divers, indeed, there are, whom I have seen, that since Joseph Scaliger delivered his opinion, have written in favour of some one or other point thereof: but Sethus Calvisius himself, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Work, De emendatione Temporum, hath not been carefull to give us notice, how long Belosus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulassar did reign, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Scaliger) but is content to set down Baladan, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scaliger himselfe revoked. In this case therefore I must lay down the plot of these divided Kingdomes, in such sort as I find it contrived by Augustinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I have seen, sets down the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that reigned in Assyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belosus, and his Posteritie; of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the last year; he appears to me a man of a curious industrie, sound judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Books hee hath received good information, and enriched his workes by inserting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse hee hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose help, without wrong or dishonour to himselfe, he hath both used and acknowledged. For mine own part, I will not spare to doe right unto Torniellus; but confesse my selfe to have received benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as he hath much confirmed me in some things, so would he have instructed and imboldened me to write more fully and lesse timorously in other things, which now I have not leasure to revise. Particularly in that conjecture (which I had faintly delivered, and yet feared lest it had over-hastily passed out of my hand, and been exposed to other mens constructions) of the four Kings that invaded the Valley of Siddim, and were slain by Abraham, I find him adventuring as I have done, to say, that they may probably be thought to have been some pettie Lords; the contrary opinion of all Writers notwithstanding. But now let us consider C. 1. §. 13.

how he hath ordered theſe laſt Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kings. After the deſtruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces, being the moſt mighty, ſought to get all to himſelf, but was oppoſed by Beloſus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Aſſyria, ſided with Beloſus, and they two prevailed ſo far, that finally Arbaces was content to ſhare the Empire with them, making ſuch a diviſion thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire between Octavian, Anthony, and Lepidus.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the reſt, as matter of certainty) that Arbaces made himſelf Soveraign Lord of all, and placed the ſeat of his Empire in Media, appointing Beloſus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phul in Aſſyria. But in ſhort ſpace, that is, in four years, it came to paſſe by the juſt judgement of God, that Phul and Beloſus rebelled againſt Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done againſt Sardanapalus; and in ſtead of being Vice-Royes, made themſelves abſolute Kings. And to this latter opinion Torniellus himſelf leans, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Hiſtories. Why hee did make and publiſh the former ſuppoſition, reſolving to hold the latter, I ſhall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to gheſſe. Having thus deviſed how Phul and Beloſus might, at the firſt, attain to be Kings, he orders their time and their ſucceſſors in this manner.

Four years after Arbaces, Phul begins to reign, and continues eight and forty years. Theglatphalaſar (whoſe name, and the names of other Princes, I write diverſly, according as the Authors whom I have in hand are pleaſed to diverſifie them) ſucceeding unto Phul, reigned three and twenty. Salmanaſſar followed him, and reigned ten. After him Senacherib reigned ſeven: and when he was ſlain, Aſarhaddon his ſon ten years; in whom that line failed.

The ſame time that Phul took upon him as King of Aſſyria, or not long after (why not rather afore? for ſo it had been more likely) Beloſus uſurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threeſcore and eight years; at the leaſt threeſcore and eight years did paſſe, before Nabonaſſar followed him in the poſſeſſion,

To Nabonaſſar, whom (with Scaliger) he thinks to be Baladan, are aſſigned ſix and twenty years: then two and fifty to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: four and twenty to Ben Merodach: and laſtly, one and twenty to Nabolaſſar the father of Nabuchodonoſor; who is like to offer matter of further diſputation.

Concerning the originall of theſe Aſſyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly ſay, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Beloſus, and confound him with Phul, appear to me more neerly reſembling the truth. Neither doe I think, that Torniellus would have conceived two different waies, by which Phul might have gotten Aſſyria (for how Beloſus came to get Babylon, it is plain enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. He adheres to the latter of the two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Hiſtorians. But he perceived, that to make Phul on the ſudden King of Aſſyria; or to give him ſo noble a Province, as would, of it ſelf, invite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing moſt unlikely to have happened, unleſſe his deſerts (whereof we find no mention) had been proportionable to ſo high a reward. And for this cauſe (as I take it) hath he deviſed the means, whereby Phul might be made capable of ſo great a ſhare in the Empire. If this were a true or probable ſuppoſition, then would a new doubt ariſe, Why this Phul being one of the three that divided all between them, was utterly forgotten by all Hiſtorians? yea, why this Diviſion it ſelfe, and the civill Warres that cauſed it, were never heard of? Queſtionleſſe, the interverting of ſome Treaſures by Beloſus, with his Judgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre leſſe note. Therefore I doe not ſee, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoyded; but that either we muſt confeſſe the Dominion given to Phul to have been exceeding his merits; or elſe his merits, and name withall, to have been ſtrangely forgotten: either of which is enough to make us think, that rather the conjecture, inferring ſuch a ſequell, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul, and Beloſus, againſt Arbaces, it was almoſt impoſſible for the Aſſyrians to recover ſuch ſtrength in four years, as might ſerve to hold out in rebellion: for Beloſus it was needleſſe to rebell, conſidering, that Arbaces did not ſeek to moleſt him, but rather permitted (as being an over-great favourer of liberty) even the Medes that were under his own Government, to doe what they liſted.

But it is now fit that wee peruse the Catalogue of these Kings; not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their own times) but speaking of their order and time in generall. If it be so unlawfull to think, that some of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors aswell as in his) may be true, especially such as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparent likelihood; why then is it said, that Phul did reign in Assyria eight and forty years? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true that painfull and judicious Writers have found this number of years to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them took it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgery (as questionlesse he is often guilty of this crime) that when he tels truth or probability, he be not beleeved for his own sake; though for our own sakes wee make use of his boldnesse, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) we are unwilling our selves to be Authors of new, though not unprofitable conjectures. Herein we shall have this commodity, that we may without blushing alter a little, to help our own opinions, and lay the blame upon Annius, against whom we shall be sure to find friends that will take our part.

The reignes of Theglathalasar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his measure, to the length of five and twenty years the one, and seventeen the other; Torniellus hath cut off two from the former, and seven from the later of them, to fit (as I think) his own computation; using the liberty whereof I spake last: for that any Author, save our good Metasthenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did reign, it is more than I have yet found. To Senacherib and Asarhaddon, Torniellus gives the same length of reign, which is found in Metasthenes. I think there are not many, that will arrogate so much unto themselves, as may very well be allowed unto a man so judicious as is Torniellus: and yet I could wish that hee had forborn to condemn the followers of Annius in this businesse, wherein he himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them, than to say, as else he must have done, almost nothing.

The like liberty we find that he hath used in measuring the reignes of the Chaldaans, filling up all the space between the end of Sardanapalus and the beginning of Nabonassar, with the threescore and eight years of Belosus. In this respect it was, perhaps, that he thought Belosus might have begun his reign somewhat later than Phul: for threescore and eight years would seem a long time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no young man when he took possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his reign, seeing his life reacheth to the end of such a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein he was a private man, enough for a long liver? Indeed eight and forty years had been somewhat of the most, considering that he seems by the story to have been a little lesse at such time as he joyned with Arbaces, and therefore the addition of twenty years did well deserve that note (which Torniellus advisedly gives) that if his reign extended not so far, then the reign of such as came after him, occupied the middle time, unto Nabonassar.

I neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modesty of Scaliger and Sethus Calvisius, in forbearing to set down as warrantable, such things as depend only upon likelihood. For things, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from us by Antiquity, must be described in History, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countreys, whereof as yet there is made no true discovery, that is, either by leaving some part blank, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of Load-stone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Rivers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by following experience, and found contrary to truth. Yet indeed the ignorance growing from distance of place, allows not such liberty to a Describer, as that which ariseth from the remedilesse oblivion of consuming time. For it is true that the Poet saith;

——Neque fervidis
Pars inclusa caloribus
Mundi nec Borea finitimum latus,
Duraeque sole Nives
Mercatorem abigunt, horrida callidi
Vincunt aequora Navita.

Not

Nor Southern heat, nor Northern snow
That freezing to the ground doth grow,
The subject Regions can fence,
And keep the greedy Merchant thence:
The subtle Shipmen way to find,
Storme never so the Seas with Wind.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe serve only to mis-lead such discoverers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers, either some angry curses or well deserved scorn; but to keep their own credit, they cannot serve alwayes. To which purpose I remember a pretty jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthy Spanish Gentleman, who had been imployed by his King in planting a Colony upon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked, him being then my Prisoner, some questions about an Island in those Streights, which, me thought, might have done either benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wives Island, saying, That whilest the fellow drew that Map, his wife sitting by, desired to put in one Countrey for her; that she in imagination, might have an Island of her own. But in filling up the blankes of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous, For it is not to be feared, that time shall runne backward, and by restoring the things themselves to knowledge, make our conjectures appear ridiculous: What if some good Copy of an ancient Author, could be found, shewing (if we have it not already) the perfect truth of these uncertainties? would it bee more shame to have believed in the mean while, Annius or Torniellus, than to have believed nothing? Here I will not say, that the credit which we gave to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to bee given to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius; yet him than them, of his assertion be more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seems to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation; I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions as have once gotten the credit of being generall, so to deal as Pacuvius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senatours of the Citie to death. He lockt the Senatours up within the State-house, and offered the lives of the People mercy; obtaining thus much, that none of them should perish, untill the Commonalty had both pronounced him worthy of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was hasty, for as fast as every name was read, all the town cryed, Let him die: but the execution required more leasure; for in substituting of another, some notorious vice of the person, or baseness of his condition, or insufficiency of his quality, made each new one that was offered to bee rejected: so that finding the worse and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

After this division of the Assyrian Empire, follows the instauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the reign of the same King Uzzia, and in his one and fiftieth year. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Jotham: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, weighty enough, have given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things unto the sacred History, which are found in prophane Authors, we should not be too carefull of drawing the Hebrews, to those works of time, which had no reference to their affairs; it is enough, that setting in due order these beginnings of accounts, we joyn them to matters of Israel and Juda, where occasion requires.

These Olympian games and exercises of activity, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his own foot; by which Pythagoras found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his body. They took name, not from the Mountain Olympus, but from the Citie Olympia, otherwise Pisa, neer unto Elis; where also

Jupiter

Jupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Grecians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was known by the name of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth year compleat, in the plains of Elis, a Citie of Peloponnesus, neer the river Alpheus.

After the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many years, till Iphitus, by advice from the Oracle of Apollo, re-established them, Licurgus the Law-giver then living: from which time they were continued by the Grecians, till the reigne of Theodosius the Emperour, according to Cedrenus: others think that they were dissolved under Constantine the Great. Aul. Gell. l. 2. ex Plut. Plut. out of Hermippus.

From this institution, Varro accompted the Grecian times and their stories to be certain: but reckoned all before, either doubtfull or fabulous: and yet Pliny gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the reigne of Cyrus, who began in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eusebius out of Diodorus, Castor, Polybius, and others, hath gathered, in whose time the seven wise Grecians flourished. For Solon had speech with Crœsus, and Crœsus was overthrown and taken by Cyrus. Plin. 36. c. 4.

Many patient and piercing brains have laboured to find out the certain beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true year of the World, and the reign of such and such Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accompt, that is, of the Worlds year, they can hardly jump in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Julian and Dydimus begin the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of Osias, or Azariah.

Eusebius, who is contrary to himself in this reckoning, accounts with those that find the very first Olympiad in the beginning of the four hundreth and sixth year after Troy; yet he telleth us that it was in the fiftieth year of Uzziah, which is (as I find it) two years later. Euseb. de Prap. Evang. l. 10. c. 3.

Eratosthenes placeth the first Olympiad four hundred and seven years after Troy, reckoning the years that passed between; to whom Dionysius Halicarnassæus, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus and many others adhere. Eratosth. apud. Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 1.

The distance between the destruction of Troy and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratosthenes. From the taking of Troy to the descent of Hercules his posterity into Peloponnesus, were fourscore years; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore years; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fifty nine; and thence to the first Olympiad, one hundred and eight years. In this account the fifft year of the first Olympiad is not included.

But vain labour it were to seek the beginning of the Olympiads by numbring the years from the taking of Troy, which is of date farre more uncertain. Let it suffice that by knowing the instauration of these games to have been in the four hundreth and eight year current after Troy, wee may reckon back to the taking of that Citie, setting that, and other accidents which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certainty of things following the Olympiads must needs teach us how to find when they began.

To this good use wee have the ensuing years unto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided by the same Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads to the passage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth fourscore and seventeen years; from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and forty years; forwards to the victory of Lysander, seven and twenty; to the battell of Leuctra, thirty four; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, five and thirty; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole summe ariseth to 453. years; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth year of Uzzia, we have arguments grounded upon that which is certain, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his reign, and the death of Alexander; as also upon the Astronomicall calculation of sundry Eclipses of the Sunne; as of that which happened when Xerxes set out of Sardis with his Army to invade Greece; and of divers other.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his reigne as King before hee was Lord of the great Monarchy, began the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that hee reigned thirty years: they who give him but twenty nine years of reign (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Justine, Eusebius, and others) begin a year later, which comes all Tul. de Div. l. 2. Just. l. 1. Euseb. de Prap. Evang. l. 10. c. 3 & de Dem. Evang. l. 8. c. 2.

all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by all good Writers in the first year of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This latter note of Alexanders death serveth well to lead us back to the beginning of Cyrus, as many the like observations doe. For if we reckon upwards from the time of Alexander, wee shall find all to agree with the years of the Olympiads, wherein Cyrus began his reign, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to signifie a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first year of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, unto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirty years compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchy, which lasted but seven years, we find compleat two hundred and seven years, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore seeing that the first year of Cyrus his Monarchy (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth year from the institution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seventy yeares of the captivity of Iuda, and desolation of the Land of Israel; manifest it is, that we must reckon back those seventy years, and one hundred threescore and ten years more, the last which passed under the Kings of Iuda, to find the first of these Olympiads; which by this account is the one and fiftieth of Uzziah, as we have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serve well to the same purpose. For examples sake; that which was seen when Xerxes mustered his Army at Sardis, in the two hundreth threescore and seventh yeer of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad, leads us back unto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence wee have a fair way through the threescore and ten years, unto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so upwards through the reignes of the last Kings of Iuda, to the one and fiftieth year of Uzzia.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads began.

To tell the great solemnity of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece, they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running, Wrestling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Mastery in those feats, whereof there was good use, but in running of Chariots, fighting With whorle-bats, and other the like antient kindes of exercises that served onely for ostentation. Thither also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all that thought themselves excellent in any laudable quality, to make tryall of their skill. Yea, the very Cryers which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them should get the honour of having playd the best part.

The Eleans were presidents of those Games; whose justice, in pronouncing without partiality who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Olive, without any other commodity following than the reputation. Indeed there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seen his three sons crowned for their severall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, Diagoras, non enim in cælum ascensuras es, that is, Die, Diagoras, for thou shalt not clime up to heaven: as if there could be no greater happinesse on earth, than what already had befallen him. In the like sense Horace speaks of these Victors, calling them,

Horat. Carm. l. 4 Ode. 2.

Quos Elaa domum reducit
Palma Cælestes.

Such as like heavenly wights do come
With an Elaan Garland home.

Neither was it only the voyce of the People, or songs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but even grave Historians thought it a matter worthy of their noting. Such was (as Tully counts it) the vanity of the Greeks, that they esteemed it almost as great an honour to have wonne the Victory at Running or Wrestling in those games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous victory, or conquest of a Province.

Tull. in Orat. pro. Flacco.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moon, and upon the fifteenth fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombæon, which doth answer to our June; and what means they used to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full, I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I may now return unto the Kings of Juda, & leave the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meet in more serious employments, when the Persian quarrells draw the body of this History into the coasts of Ionia and Hellespont.

§. VI.

Of Jotham and his Contemporaries.

Jotham the sonne of Uzziah, when he was five and twenty yeers old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in Jerusalem, his Father yet living. Hee built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits upright, and therfore called Ophel: besides divers Cities in the Hills of Juda, and in the Forrests, Towers & Palaces: he inforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundred talents, and of Wheat and Barly two thousand measures: hee reigned fixe and twenty years: of whom Josephus gives this testimonie: Ejusmodi vero Princeps hic fuit, ut nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres: ut qui Deum adeo pie coluerit, hominibus suis adeo juste præfuerit, urbem ipsam tanta sibi curæ esse passus sit, & tantopere auxerit, ut universum regnum hostibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem eius incolis atque civibus fœlix, fausum & fortunatum sua virtute effecerit; This was such a Prince, as a man could find no kind of vertue wanting in him: hee worshiped God so religiously, he governed his men so righteously, he was so provident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplifie it, that by his vertue and prowesse he made his whole Kingdome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Servants, Inhabitants and Citizens, prosperous and happie. 2 King 15. 33.

This is all that I find of Jotham: his reigne was not long, but as happie in all things, as he himselfe was devout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelestus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which governed from yeare to yeare. And yet Pausanias in his second Book, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places, are of opinion, That Corinth was governed by Kings of the race of the Bacidæ, to the time of Cypselus, who drove them out.

Teglathphalassar, or Tiglathpeleser, the son of Phul the second of the Babylonians and Assyrians that was of this new race, about this time invaded Israel, while Pekah (who murthered his Master Pekeiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition he took most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galilee, with those of Gilead over Jordan, and carried the inhabitants captive. This Tiglath reigned five and twenty years, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzheimius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he reigned yet two yeares longer; which yeares I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Æra of Nabonassar begins with his single reign, but reckon them to Tiglath Phulassar himselfe, who therewith reigned 17. yeeres. 2 King 15.

Aeschylus, the son of Agamnestor, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled 25. years. Alcamenes governed Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius. But therein surely Eusebius is mistaken: for Diodore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witnesse the contrary. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and reigned 60. years, and out-lived the Messeniack warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicander, his royall companion. Paus lib. 3.

At this time lived Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Assyrian Empire, and of the citie of Nineve, which succeeded (saith Josephus) a hundred & fifteen yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were built at this time, while in Media, Sosarmus and Medidus reigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of Achaz and his Contemporaries.

Ahaz, or Achaz, succeeded unto Jotham in the seventeenth yeer of Peka, the son of Remalia: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers reign, who began in the second of the same Peka, and reigned 16. but not compleat yeeres. This Ahaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predeceſſors. He made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his ſon for ſacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was re-

2 King 16.11. 2 Chron.28. preſented by a man-like brazen body, bearing the head of a Calfe, ſet up not far from Jeruſalem, in a Valley ſhadowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is uſed for Hell. The children offered, were incloſed within the carkaſſe of this Idoll, and as the fire encreaſed, ſo the ſacrificers, with a noyſe of Cimbals and other Inſtruments, filled the ayre, to the end the pittifull cries of the children might not bee heard: which unnaturall, cruell, and devilliſh Oblation, Jeremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome upon the tenth of Matthew
C.7.19.32. hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leviticus the eighteenth, it appeareth that this horrible ſinne was ancient: in the twelfth of Deuteronomie, it is called an abhomination which God hateth. That it was alſo practiſed elſewhere, and by many Nations remote from Judæa, divers Authors witneſſe; as Virgil in the ſecond of Æneids—— Sanguine placaſtis, &c. & Silvius—— Poſtere cæde Deos. Saturne is ſaid to have brought this cuſtome into Italy, beſides the caſting of many ſoules into the River of Tyber, inſtead of which, Hercules commanded, that the waxen Images of men ſhould be thrown in and drowned. The Devill alſo taught the Carthaginians this kind of butcherie, inſomuch, that when their Citie was beſieged, and in diſtreſſe, the Prieſt made them beleeve, that becauſe they had ſpared their own children, and had bought and brought up others to bee offered, that therefore Saturne had ſtirred up and ſtrengthened their Euſeb. de Præp: Evang. lib 6. Dion. lib. 1. Diod. lib. 20. Enemies againſt them: whereupon they preſently cauſed two hundred of the nobleſt youths of their Citie to be ſlaine, and offered to Saturn or Satan, to appeaſe him: who beſides theſe fornamed Nations, had inſtructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Meſſena, of Galatia, with the Maſſagetes, and others, in theſe his ſervices. Further, as if he were not content to deſtroy the ſoules of many Nations in Europe, Aſia, and Acoſt de Hiſtor. nat. & mor. Ind. Africa, (as Acoſta writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Devill under this fearefull ſervitude, in which he alſo holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

For the wickedneſſe of this King Ahaz, God ſtirred up Rezin of Damaſcus, and Pekah the Son of Remaliah, King of Iſrael againſt him, who invaded Judæa, and beſieged Jeruſalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, poſſeſt himſelf of Elah by the Red Sea, and caſt the Jewes out of it; and Pekah ſlaughtered in one day an hundred and twenty thouſand Judæans, of 2 Chron.28.6. the ableſt of the Kingdome, at which time Maaſeiah, the Sonne of Achaz, was alſo ſlaine by Zichri, with Azrikam the Governour of his houſe, and Elcanath the ſecond perſon unto the King. Beſides all this, two hundred thouſand priſoners of women and children, the Iſraelites lead away to Samaria: but by the counſell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and delivered back againe.

As Iſrael and Aram vexed Juda on the North; ſo the Edomites & the Philiſtims, who evermore attended the ruine of Judæa, entred upon them from the South, and took Bethſemes, Aalon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, & Gemzo, ſlew many people, & carried away
2 Chron. 28. many priſoners. Whereupon when Achaz ſaw himſelf environed on all ſides, & that his Idols and dead gods gave him no comfort, hee ſent to the Aſſyrian Tiglatphileſer, to 2 Kings 16. deſire ſome aide from him againſt the Iſraelites and Aramites, preſenting him with the ſilver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings houſe.

Tiglatphileſer wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that roſe in Paleſtina. His Father having lately made himſelf from a Provinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Aſſyria, had a little before led him the way into Judæa, invited by Menahem, King of Iſrael. Wherefore now the Son willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochas himſelf, hee was content to aſſigne ſome other time for going through with this enterprize: becauſe (as I have ſaid before) he was not firmely ſettled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet ſtrong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treaſures of Jeruſalem, prepared his Army, firſt invaded the Territorie of Damaſcus, wanne the Citie, & killed Rezin the laſt of the race of the Adads, who began with David, & ended with this Achaz. At Damaſcus, Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a pattern of the Altar, ſent it to Urias the Prieſt, commanding the like to be made at Jeruſalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath poſſeſt all Baſan, and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then passing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the Kingdome of Israel, and made them his Vassals. And notwithstanding that hee was invited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Israel, he possest himself of the greater part of Juda, and, as it seemeth, inforced Achaz to pay him tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that hee revolted from Asshur, or rebelled against him, & therfore was invaded by Sennacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeer of his reigne he died; but was not buried in the Sepulchres of the Kings of Juda.

With Ahaz lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed 40. years, saith Eusebius: Diodorus and Ctesias find Anticarnus in stead of this Medidus, to have been his successor, to whom they give 50. yeeres. Euseb. in Chron.

Teglath Phileser held the Kingdome of Assyria, all the reign of Ahaz: yet so, that Salmanassar his Son may seeme to have reigned with him some part of the time. For wee find that Ahaz did send unto the Kings of Asshur to help him. The Geneva note saies, that these Kings of Asshur, were Tiglath Pileser, and those Kings that were under his Dominion. But that he or his Father had hitherto made such conquests, as might give him the Lordship over other Kings, I doe neither find any History, nor circumstance that proveth. Wherefore I think that these Kings of Asshur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his Son, who reigned with his Father, as hath been said before: though how long hee reigned with his Father, it had been hard to define. 2 King 28.16.

At this time began the Ephori in Lacedæmon, a hundred and thirty years after Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Eusebius makes their beginning far later, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen every yeare, were controllers, as well of their Senators, as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and consent. For (saith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Ahaz died Aeschylus, who had ruled in Athens ever since the fifteth yeare of Uzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medontida, or Governours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) succeeded his Father Aeschylus, and was the last of their Governors: he ruled onely two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Governors for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burgho-Master, or Governor of their City for ten yeeres. Plutarch. in vita Solo.

This alteration Pausanias in his fourth Book begins in the first yeere of the eighth Olympiad, Eusebius & Halicarnassæus in the first of the seventh Olympiad: at which time indeed, Coræbus the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines, governed about three hundred yeare by the Sylvii, of the race of Aeneas, took end in the same Ahaz time: the foundation of Rome being laid by Romulus & Remus in the eighth yeere of the same King. Codoman builds it in the eleventh of Achaz. Buchoizer in the eighth, as I thinke he should; others somewhat later, and in the reigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the sixt Olympiad. But Halicarnassæus, Solinus, Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seventh; who seeme not onely to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best accompt.

CHAP. XXIIII.

Of the Antiquitie of Italy, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahaz.

Of the old Inhabitants, and of the name of Italy.

AND here to speak of the more ancient times of Italy, and what Nations posseſt it before the arivall of Aeneas, the place may seem to invite us: the rather becauſe much fabulous matter hath been mixed with the truth of thoſe elder plantations. Italy before the fall of Troy, was known to the Greeks by divers names; as first Hesperia, then Ausonia, the one name ariſing of the ſeat, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was alſo Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri, whom Halicarnaſſaus thinkes to have been the first that brought a Colony of Arcadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italy of Italus: concerning which changes of names, Virgil ſpeakes thus:

Eſt locus, Heſperiam Graii cognomine dicunt,
Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque ubere gleba:
Oenotrii coluere viri, nunc fama, minores
Italiam dixiſſe, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greeks Heſperia name,
Ancient, and ſtrong, of much fertility:
Oenotrians held it, but we hear by fame,
That by late ages of Poſterity,
Tis from a Captaines name call'd Italy.

Who this Captain or King may have bin, it is very uncertain. For Virgil ſpeakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enough it is, that the name which hath continued ſo long upon the whole Countrie, and worn out all other denominations, was not at the firſt accepted without good cauſe. Therefore to find out the originall of this name, and the firſt planters of this noble Countrie, Reineccius hath made a very painfull ſearch, and not improbable conjecture. And firſt of all he grounds upon that of Halicarnaſſaus, who ſpeakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did lead into Italy, before the name of Italy was given to it; Secondly, upon that of Juſtine, who ſaith, that Brundaſium was a Colonie of the Aetolians; Thirdly, upon that of Strabo, who affirmes the ſame of Temeſa or Tempſa, a Citie of the Brutii in Italy; Laſtly, upon the authority of Plinie, who ſhewes that the Italians did inhabit only one Region of the Land, whence afterward the name was derived over all. Concerning that which is ſaid of the Eleans and Aetolians, who (as he ſhews) had one originall; from them he brings the name of Italy. For the world Italia, differs in nothing from Aitolia, ſave that the firſt Letter is caſt away, which in the Greek words is common; & the letter (o) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Aethalia an Iſland neer Italy, peopled by the Aetholians: and the like changes are very familiar in the Aeolis Dialect; of which Dialect (being almoſt proper to the Aetolians) the accent & pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionyſius Halicarnaſſaus, Quintilian, and Priſcian the Grammarian teach.

Juſt. lib. 12.
Strabo lib. 6.
Plin. lib. 3. c. 5.

Hereunto appertaines that of Julian the Apoſtata, who called the Greekes couſins of the Latines. Alſo the common Originall of the Greekes and Latines from Javan; and the Fable of Janus, whoſe Image had two faces, looking Eaſt and Weſt, as Greece and Italy lay, and was ſtamped on Coynes, with a Ship on the other ſide; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Javan, father of the Greekes and Latines: who ſayling over the Ionian Sea, that lies between Aetolia and the Weſtern parts of Greece and Italy, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Reineccius thinkes, that the names of Atlas and Italus belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Berosus, who called Cethim, Italus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whileſt he abode in Italy with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and ſtronger, eaſily diſproved. For they who make mention of Atlas, place him before the time of Moſes: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the ſon of Javan, and nephew of Japheth, the eldeſt ſon of Noah: which antiquity far exceeds the name of Italy, that began after the departure of Hercules out of the Countrey, not long before the Warre of Troy.

Likewiſe Virgil, who ſpeakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Electra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italy, but calleth Electra & her ſiſter Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italus among the Kings of the Aborigenes; which he would not have done, had Atlas and Italus beene one perſon.

As for the authority of Berosus in this caſe, we need the leſſe to regard it, for that Reynecius himſelf, whoſe conjectures are more to bee valued than the dreames wherewith Annius hath filled Berosus, holds it but a figment.

That the name of Italy began long after Atlas, it appeares by the verſes of Virgil laſt rehearſed, wherein hee would not have ſaid, ——Nun fama minores Italiam dixiſſe ducis de nomine gentem, had that name beene heard of ere Dardanus left the Countrey. But ſeeing that, when Hercules, who died a few yeeres before the Warre of Troy, had left in Italy a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the ſame Nation with the Aetolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Pauſanias teach) then the name of Italy began: & ſeeing Virgil makes mention of Italus among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldeneſſe to ſay, that Italus was Commander of theſe Eleans. For though I remember not that I have read of any ſuch Greek as was named Italus; yet the name of Aetolus written in Greek Aitolus, was very famous among the Aetolians, and among the Eleans, he being ſon of a King of Elis, & founder of the Aetolian Kingdome. Neither is it more hard to derive the name of Italus from Aetolus, than Italia from Aetolia. So may Virgils authority ſtand well with the collections of Reynecius; the name of Italy being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

§. II.

Of the Aborigenes, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reaſon of the names of Latini and Latium.

IN Italy the Latines and Hetrurians were moſt famous; the Hetrurians having held the greateſt part of it under their ſubjection, & the Latines by the vertue and felicity of the Romans (who were a branch of them) ſubduing all Italy, and in few ages whatſoever Nation was known in Europe: together with all the Weſterne parts of Aſia, and North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was firſt inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnaſſæus, Varro, & Reynecius (following them) think to have bin Arcadians: & this name of Aborigines (to omit other ſignifications that are ſtrained) imports as much as Originall, or Native of the place, which they poſſeſſed: which title the Arcadians are known in vaunting manner to have alwayes uſurped, fetching their antiquity from beyond the Moone; becauſe indeed, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponneſus inforced to forſake their ſeates ſo oft as other Greeks were, who did dwell without that halfe Iſland, neither had the Arcadians ſo unſure a dwelling as the reſt of the Peloponneſians, becauſe their Countrey was leſſe fruitfull in land, mountainous, & hard of acceſſe, & they themſelves (as in ſuch places commonly are found) very warlike men. Some of theſe therefore having occupied a great part of Latium, & held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, ſtile themſelves Aborigenes, in that language, which either their new Seat, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might be that the Arcadians, who dwelt ſomwhat far from Sea, & are alwaies noted as unapt men to prove good Mariners, ſhould have bin Authors of new diſcoveries, were a queſtion not eaſie to be anſwered, were it not ſo, that both fruitfulneſſe of children, in which thoſe ages abounded, inforced the ſuperfluous company to ſeeke another ſeat, & that ſome expeditions of the Arcadians, eſpecially that of Evander, into the ſame parts of Italy, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigenes, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gave name to all Greece: but their antiquities are long since dead, for lacke of good records. Neither was their glory such in Italy, as could long sustaine the name of their own Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Ausones, Arunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some civility; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Augustine called Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Stercutius, & say, that he taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium took his name of Saturn, because he did latere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Jupiter, it is questionlesse a fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanity to think that any thing could bee hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fledde from another; so in the truth of History, it is well known, that no King reigning in those parts was so mighty, that it should bee hard to find one Country or another, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit. And yet, as most fables and poeticall fictions were occasioned by some ancient truth, which either by ambiguity of speech, or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkely expresse (for so they fained a passage over a River in Hell, because death is a passage to another life: & because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painfull, therefore they nameed the River Styx, of Hate; Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron, of Paine: so also because men are stonie-hearted; and because the Greek λαοὶ, people, and λᾶες, stones, are neere in sound, therefore they feigned in the time of Deucalion stones converted into men, as at other times men into stones:) in like manner it may be, that the originall of Saturnes hiding himself, was some allusion to that old opinion of the wisest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Acts; whence also Esay of the true God saies, tu Deus abdens te. For it cannot be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also have this very signification, if it be derived (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not but that the originall of this word, Latium, ought rather to be sought elsewhere.

See lib. 1. cap. 6. §. 1. & seq.

Esay 45. 15.

Reyneccius doth conjecture that the Ceteans, who descended of Cethim, the Son of Javan, were the men who gave the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Trojans in their warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer, calls them subjects to the Crown of Troy. Hereupon Reyneccius gathers, that their abode was in Asia: viz. in agro Elaitico, in the Elaitian Territory, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a City which the Aeolians held in Asia, called Elæa, or Elaia, Pausanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidæmis, or (according to the Greek writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed hath a very neere sound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greek Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing only in the strength or weakednesse of utterance, which is found betweene many English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans, being descended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Javan, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the City, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elaites, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Aetolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Aeolique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Elæus, the Haven Elæus, the people Elaita, the City Elæus, Elair, & Elateia; of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Cetæi and Arcadians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing unlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might nevertheless differ in sound and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name they had a Prince that founded the City Elateia) bee named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius, pursuing this likelihood, thinkes that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, (being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat upon Auge, the daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia) was slaine by Achilles in the Trojan Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Eurypilus, conduct the Ceteans, who (fearing what evill might befall themselves by the Greeks, if the affairs of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italy, whereas the Arcadians were planted by Oenotrius. And Reyneccius farther thinkes, that Telephus being the more gracious among among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memory of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Lady, was well contented to take an Arcadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinus. That this name of Elatus may have bin taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sons of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gave name to the Countrey: & betweene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost enterchangeably, for many ages, till at the end of the Troian warre it fell into the hand of Hippotheus of the race of Elatus, in whose Posterity it continued untill the last. Againe, the name of Latinus, having a derivative sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made over-boldly, yet others may follow it with the lesse reproofe, considering that it is not easie to find either an apparent truth, or faire probability among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of Latium.

§. VI.

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines untill Æneas his comming.

THe Kings which reigned in Latium before the arivall of Aeneas, were Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembre, save what is mentioned already, and many Fables of the Greekes, which whether they be applyable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne of the Greekes, called by them κρόνος, or some other, stiled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein he lived, may very well admit him to have bin the same: but the names of * Stercus, and Stercutius (for it may bee, this name was not borrowed from the skill which hee taught the people, but rather the soile which they laid on their grounds had that appellation from him) doe rather make him seeme some other man.

* Ezekie often cals the Idols of the Heathen deos stercoreos: and hence it may be that in the Evangelist we reade of Belzebub, Belzebul, which is interpreted Dominus sterctcus: and it may bee that after that Saturne became the name of an Idol, it pleased God that in a like sense this name Stercutius should sticke unto him. Aeneid. 7.

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The fable of his being changed into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well seeme (as it is interpreted) to have grown from the skill which he had in sooth-saying, or divination, by the flight and chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Son of Picus, reigned after his Father: He gave to Evander the Arcadian (who having slain by mischance his Father Echemus King of Arcadia, fled into Italy) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward built.

Fauna, called Fatua, the sister of Faunus, who was also his wife, as all Historians agree, she was held a Propheteesse, and highly commended for her chastity, which praise in her must needs have bin much blemished by her marriage, it self being meerly incestuous. It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his sister any childe, neither doe we read of any other Wife which he had, save onely that Virgil gives unto him Latinus as his Son, by a Nymph called Marica.

But who this Marica was, it is not found, save onely that her aboad was about the River Liris neere Minturnæ,

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted four: one, the Son of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vlysses by Circe, the fourth of Telemachus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom he saith, that is hname was Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cetii, were from his surname called Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference consisting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus the son of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a son of the same name. This Latinus having obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter and Heire Lavinia, to Turnus the son of Veniba, who was sister to Amata Latinus his Wife, Suidas in the word Latini.

But when Aeneas arrived in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might be imbarked, according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessels then used, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troian, and moved with the great reputation of Aeneas, which himself had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gave his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus; who incensed herewith, sought to avenge himself by warre: which was soone ended with his own death.

Of Amata the Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were she an Italian, she could not have born a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of Aeneas; unlesse wee should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Cetei into Italy, to Telephus the Father, than to his Son, who served in the last yeere of the Trojan Warre. But Reyneccius holds her an Asiatique, and thinkes withall, that Lavinia was borne before Telephus came into Italy. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnassæus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro; who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might be derived from the Greek name Pallas. Amata, which signifieth beloved, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called every Virgin whom he took to serve as a Nunne of Vesta; wherfore it is the more easie to be thought a surname, howsoever Virgil discourse of her and Venilia her sister.

Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Aeneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrie, was established in that race: wherin it continued untill it was over-grown by the might and greatnesse of the Romans.

§. IV.

Of Æneas, and of the Kings and Governors of Alba.

ÆNEAS himself being of the Royall bloud of Troy, had the command of the Dardanians: he was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Trojans. By his wife Creusa, the daughter of Priamus, he had a sonne called Ascanius; whose surname was Julus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) bin surnamed Ilus. But when Aeneas was dead, his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with childe by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a son, called thereupon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because he was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lavinia was so evill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourable, and using her as a Queene, did foster her young son, his halfe-brother Sylvius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the situation of the place; Ascanius leaving to his motherinlaw the Citie Lavinium, which Aeneas had built and called after his new wives name, founded the Citie Alba Longa, and therein reigned. The time of his reigne was, according to some, eight and twenty yeers: Virgil gives him thirty; others five and thirty, and eight and thirty. After his decease, there arose contention betweene Sylvius, the son of Aeneas, and Julus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lavinia, Julus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posterity were afterwards called Sylvii.

The reigne of the Alba Kings, with the continuance of each mans reigne, I find thus set downe:

1 Sylvius Posthumus.	29
2 Sylvius Æneas.	31
3 Sylvius Latinus.	50
4 Sylvius Alba.	39
5 Sylvius Atis.	26

7 Sylvius Capetus.	13	years.
8 Sylvius Tiberinus.	8
9 Sylvius Agrippa.	41
10 Sylvius Alladius.	19
11 Sylvius Aventinus.	37
12 Sylvius Procas.	23
13 Sylvius Amulius.	42
Sylvius Numitor.

Ilia, called also Rhea and Sylvia.

Romulus. Remus.

The

The most of these Kings lived in peace, and did little or nothing worthy of remembrance.

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much upon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Prisci Latini. Of Tiberinus some thinke that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called Albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the coming of Aeneas into Italy. The Mountain Aventinus had name (as many write) from Aventinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therin: but Virgil hath it otherwise. Julius, the brother of Aventinus, is named by Eusebius as father of another Julius, & grandfather of Julius Proculus, who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome: Numitor, the elder son of Procas, was deprived of his Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom also his son Aegesthus was slain, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Vesta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But she conceived two sons, either by her Uncle Amulius, as some think; or by Mars, as the Poets feign; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children, their Uncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quick, according to the law; which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was so, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by all, that the two children were preserved, who afterward revenged the cruelty of their Uncle, with the slaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grandfather to the Kingdome: wherein how long hee reigned, I find not, neither is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; upon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concernes the things of Italy) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were governed by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hostilius, King of the Romanes, making Warre upon Rome, dyed in the Camp; and Metius Suffetius, the successor of Cluilius, who surrendred the Estate of Alba unto the Romans, having committed the hazzard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each side, who decided the quartell by Combat: in which, the three brethren Horatii, the Champions of the Romans, prevailed against the Curiatii, Champions of the Albanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battail, hoping thereby to leave the Romanes to such an overthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deal with; Tullus, who notwithstanding this falsehood, obtained the victory, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be tyed to two Chariots, and so torne in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed, and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patricians; among which were the Julii: of whom C. Julius Caesar being descended, not only gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedegree, in full assembly of the Romans, then governed by a free Estate of the People; but by his rare industrie, valour, and judgement, obtained the Soveraignty of the Romane Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posterity; whereby the name of Aeneas, and honour of the Trojan and Alban Race, was so revived, that seldome, if ever, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glory.

§. V.

Of the beginning of Rome, and of Romulus birth and death.

OF Rome, which devoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat uncertain) depend much upon the birth and education of Romulus, the grand-child of Numitor, the last that reigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean, were broken in pieces by the yron teeth of this fourth Beast, it is not to bee described in one place, having been the worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident unto the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius tius Cato, Calphurnius Piso, Sempronius, & others, seek to derive the Romans from Jano; but Herodotus, Marsylus, and many others of equall credit, give the Gracians for their Strab. 5. f. 159. ancestors: & as Strabo reporteth in his fifth Book, Cæcilius rerum Romanarum Scriptor, eo argumento colligit, Romam à Græcis esse conditam, quod Romani Græco ritu, antiquo instituto, Herculi rem sacram faciant: matrem quoque Evandri veneranter Romani; Cæcilius (saith he) a Roman Historiographer, doth by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greeks, because the Romans, after Greekish fashion, by ancient ordinance, doe sacrifise to Hercules: the Romans also worship the mother of Evander.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembreth many founders of that Citie: as Romanus the son of Ulysses and Circe; Romus the son of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tyrant of the Latines, who drave the Tuscans out of that Countrey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome upon Evander, saying, That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to a captive Lady, brought thither by the Gracians: others say, That it was anciently called Febris, after the name of Februa, the mother of Mars; witnesse S. Augustine in his third Book de Civitate Dei. But Livie will have it to be the work of Romulus, even from the foundation: of whom and his consorts, Juvenal to a Roman Citizen, vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verses:

Attamen ut longè repetas, longèque revolvas,
Majorum quisquis primus fuit ille tuorum,
Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.

Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so farre;
Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were,
Some Shepheard was, or else, that Ile forbeare, meaning, either a Shepheard or a Theefe.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars supposed to be his father; that he was nurst by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustula a Shepheards wife. The same unnaturall nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch saith, it is like enough that Amulius came covered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: & therein it seemeth to me that he might have two purposes; the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other, to satisfie his appetite, because she was faire and goodly. For she being made a Nunne of the goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to break her chastitie. I also find Fauchet f. 114. in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Meroüee, King of the Francs, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Let them beleeve it that list; Il le croira qui vivdra: Also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poeticall inventions: But to answer these imaginations in generall, It is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatry, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the mind, or as there were of vices and vertues, then did many women greatly borne, cover such slips as they made, by protesting to bee forced by more than humane power: so did Oenone confesse to Paris, that she had been ravished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that hee had known Venus. But Rhea was made with child by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars, the god of battell, according to the sense of the time. Oenone was overcome by a strong wit, and by such a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Meroüee might fancie a Sea Captaine, to be gotten with young by such a one: as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Aeneas was a bastard, and begotten upon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the child of lust, which is Venus. Romulus was nurst by a Wolfe, which was Lupa, or Lupina; for the Curtesans in those dayes were called Wolfes, Quæ nunc (saith Halicarnassæus) honestiori vocabulo amicæ appellantur; Which are now by an honester name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken up into heaven, or rather out of the world, by his father Mars, in a great storme of thunder and lightnig: so was it said that Aeneas vanished away by the River Numicus:

but thereof Livie also speaketh modestly; for hee rehearseth the other opinion that the storme was the furie of the Senators, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking up; and many Authors agree, that there was an unnaturall darkenesse, both at his birth, and at his death; and that he might be slain by thunder or lightning, it is not unlikely. For the Emperour Anastasius was slaine with lightning; so was Strabo the Father of Pompey slaine with a thunder-bolt: so Carus the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilest hee lodged with his Army upon the River Tygris, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same Kind might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of war, & by violence destroyed. And that he died by violence (which destiny followed most of the Roman Emperous) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus, who was the seventh King after him: who when he had murthered his Father-in-law, commanded that he should not be buried, for (said hee) Romulus himselfe died and was not buried. But let Halicarnassæus end this dispute; whose words are these: They (saith hee) who drew neerest to the truth, say that he was slaine by his own Citizens; and that his cruelties in punishment of offenders, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his slaughter. For it is reported, that both when his mother was ravished, whether by some man, or by a god, the whole body of the Sunne was eclipsed, and all the earth covered with darkednesse like unto night, & that the same did happen at his death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, doth contain (besides what is here already spoken of him) the conquest of a few miles, which had soone bin forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built upon that foundation, had not given it memory in all ages following, even unto this day. A valiant man he was, very strong of body, patient of travell, and temperate in diet, as forbearing the use of wine & delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, & neglect to revenge the death of Tatius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himself might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He reigned 37. yeers, first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death, single, till he was slaine, as is already shewed: after which time, the Soveraignty fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him unknown, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her latter times hath somewhat resembled this King. For having long bin sole Governesse, till Constantinople shared with her: afterwards, when as the Greek Emperour was crushed by forreine enemies, and the Latines dispoyled of Imperiall power, she fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheep-hook to the Sword, and therewith victorious to excessive magnificence, from whence by the same degrees it fell, being driven from luxurie to defensive armes; and therein having bin unfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Crosier staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place, by occasion of the Storie of the times of King Ahaz, during whose reign in Furie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laid.

Chap. XXV.

Of Ezechia, and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

Of the beginning of Ezechias, and of the agreeing of Ptolomie, Nabonassar, Nabopolassar and Mardocempadus, with the historie of the Bible.

As the first yeere of Ahaz his reign was confounded with the last of his father Jotham, so was the latter end of his sixteen years taken up in the three first of Ezechias his son. This appeares by the Reigne of Hosea, over Israel; which began in the twelfth of Ahaz, and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his fourteenth. But the third of Hosea was the first of Ezechia, so it followes, that Ezechia began to reign in this Fathers foureteenth yeere. Like enough it is, that the third yeer of Hosea, the same being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almost spent when Ezechia began, and so so the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may have been concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezechia.

By supposing that Hosea began his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeer of Ahaz was almost compleat, some would find the meanes how to dis-joyne the first of Hezechia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one year later, of which yeere, Ahaz may perhaps have lived not many dayes. But seeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezechia may not be removed out of their places, it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

2 King 19. 35. In the fourteenth yeere of Ezechia, Senacherib, invading Juda and the Countries adjoyning, lost his Armie by a miraculous stroak from Heaven, fled home, and was slaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeers to the life of Ezechia, when hee had already reigned fourteen of his nine and twenty: and the same yeere was that miracle seene of the Sunnes going back; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day, which answered unto the twenty fift of April, in the Julian yeer, being then Thursday. I have not seene any workes of Scultet, but surely to find a motion so irregular and miraculous, it is necessary that he produce some record of observation made at such a time. Howsoever it be, the fifteenth yeare of Ezechia agreed upon, and therefore we may not alter the first. As for that saying, which is usuall in like cases,

2 Chron. 28. 27 that Ahaz slept with his Fathers, & Ezechia his Sonne reigned in his steed, it doth no more prove that Ezechia reigned not with his Father, than the like saying doth inferre the like at the death of Jehosaphat, and succession of Joram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to reign whilest his Father lived, wee have already said enough.

Of this godly King Ezechias, we find, that his very beginning testified his devotion and zeale. For whether it were so, that his unfortunrte and ungracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gave way to his Sons proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first moneth of his

2 Chro. 29. v. 3. reign, wherein Ezechias opened the doores of the Temple, were to bee understood as the beginning of his sole government; wee plainly find it to have been his first work,

2 Chron. 30. that hee opened the doores of the house of the Lord, which Achaz had shut up, cleansed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, restored the Priests to their offices & estates, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered which had bin for many yeeres neglected, & brake down the brasen Serpent of Moses, because the people burnt incense before it, & hee called it Nehushtan, which signifieth a lumpe of brasse. He did also celebrate the Passe-over

2 King 18. with great magnificence, inviting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes. Many there were, even out of those Tribes, that came up to Jerusalem, to this feast: But the generall multitude of Israel did laugh the Messengers of Ezechia to scorne.

It was not long ere they that scorned to solemnize the memoriall of their deliverance out of the Egyptian servitude, fell into a new servitude, out of which they never were delivered. For in the fourth of Ezechia his reign, Salmanassar the Son of Tiglath the Son of Belochus, hearing that Hosea King of Israel had practised with So King of Egypt, against him, invaded Israel, besieged Samaria, and in the third year (after the inhabitants had endured all sorts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Assyria and Media: among whom Tobias, and his Son of the same name, with Anna his Wife, were sent to Nineve, in whose Seates and Places the Assyrians sent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Israelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land,

These later Assyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first of whom wee find mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serve most aptly to joyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better known, and described in course of History. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we find in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Phul & Salmanassar, with other Assyrian, Chaldean Kings, diversity of name hath bred question of the persons. Therfore, whereas the Scriptures doe speak of Salmanassar, King of Assur, who reigned in the time of Ahaz and Ezechia, Kings of Juda, & of Hosea King of Israel, whom hee carried into captivity: and whereas Ptolomy makes mention of Nabonassar, speaking precisely of the time wherein he lived, it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and Nabonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it be shewed of Nabuchadnezzar, that he was the same whom Ptolomy calleth Nabopolassar.

Of both these points Bucholcerus hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact calculations of sundry good Mathematicians. For by them it appears, that between Nabonassar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred forty and six years, at which distance of time the reign of Salmanassar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the same Bucholcerus allegeth out of Erasmus Reinholdus, in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadus King of Babylon (whom Ptolomy, speaking of three Eclipses of the Moon, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures call Merodach, who sent Embassadours to Hezechias King of Juda. So that if we reckon backward to the difference of time between Merodach and Salmanasser, we shall find it the same which is between Mardocempadus and Nabonassar. Likewise Functius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria, to the destruction of Jerusalem, in the nineteenth of Nabuchadnezzar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirty and three years; the self same distance of time is found in Ptolomy, between Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For whereas Ptolomy seems to differ from this accompt, making Nabonassar more antient by an hundred and forty years, than the destruction of Jerusalem, wee are to understand that he took Samaria in the eighth year of his reign; so that the seven foregoing years added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall even with that of Ptolomy. Ptolomies computation is, that from the first of Nabonassar, to the fifth of Nabopolassar, there passed one hundred twenty and seven years. Now if wee adde to these one hundred twenty seven, the thirteen ensuing of Nabuchadnezzars years, before the City and Temple were destroyed, wee have the summe of one hundred and forty years. In so plain a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serve for all, that Ptolomy placeth the first of Nabopolassar one hundred twenty and two years after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the consent of all Mathematicians, which in accompt of times I hold more sure than the authority of any History; and therefore I think it folly to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe so throughly concurre.

Yet foralmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest unanswered, whereby he proved Baladan the Father of Merodach, to have been this Nabonassar, I will not spare to lose a word or two in giving the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the best observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Ptolomy recorded, after the time of Nabonassar, were in the reign of Mardocempadus; the second year of whose reign is according to Ptolomy, concurrent in part with the twenty seven of Nabonassar. For the second of three antient Eclipses which hee calculates, being in the second year of Mardocempadus, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twenty seven years, seventeen dayes, and eleven hours; the accompt from Nabonassar, beginning at high-noon the first day of the Egyptian Moneth Thot, then answering to the twenty sixt of February; and this Eclipse being fifty minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of February; so that the difference of time between the two Kings Nabonassar and Mardocempadus, is noted by Ptolomy, according to the Egyptian years. But how doth this prove, that Mardocempadus or Meradach, was the Sonne of Nabonassar? yea, how doth it prove, that he was his next Successour, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to satisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himself did afterwards believe Mardocempadus to have been rather the Nephew than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if hee might bee either the Nephew, or the Sonne, hee might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But because our Countrie-man Lidiat hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion, and that both Torniellus, who followes Scaliger herein, and Sethus Calvisius, who hath drawn into form of Chronology, that learned work, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold up the same assertion, confounding Baladan with Nabonassar, I have taken the pains to search, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might prove the Kindred or Succession of these two: Yet cannot I find in the Almageſt (for the Scriptures are either ſilent in this point, or adverſe to Scaliger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this buſineſſe) any ſentence more neerly proving the ſucceſſion of Merodach to Nabonaſſar, than the place now laſt rehearſed: which makes no more, to ſhew that the one of theſe was father to the other, than (that I may uſe a like example) the as neer ſucceſſion of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have bin Son, or Grand-child to Edward the Confeſſor. This conſidered, we may ſafely go on without account from Nabonaſſar, taking him for Salmanaſſar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our Book, when they find ſomething in it agreeing with Annius, forasmuch as theſe Kings mentioned in Scriptures, reigned in Babylon and Aſſyria, in thoſe very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are aſſigned to Belosus, Nabonaſſar, and Mardocempadus, and the reſt: no good Hiſtorie naming any others that reigned there in thoſe ages; and all Aſtronomicall obſervations, fitly concurring with the years that are attributed to theſe, or numbred from them.

§. II.

Of the danger and deliverance of Judæa from Senacherib.

WHen Salmanaſſar was dead, and his ſon Senacherib in poſſeſſion of the Empire, in the fourteenth year of Ezechias, he demanded of him ſuch Tribute as was agreed on, at ſuch time as Teglath, the Grand-father of Senacherib, and Father of Salmanaſſar, invited by Ahaz, invaded Rezin King of Damaſcus, and delivered him from the dangerous Warre which Iſrael had undertaken againſt him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Senacherib, having (as it ſeems) a purpoſe to invade Egypt, ſent one part of his Armie to lye before Jeruſalem. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchaſed his peace, as he hoped, with thirty hundred talents of ſilver, and thirty talents of gold, wherewith he preſented Senacherib, now ſet down before Lachis in Judæa; yet under the colour of better aſſurance, and to force the King of Judæa to deliver hoſtages, the Aſſyrian invironed Jeruſalem with a groſſe Armie, and having his ſword in his hand thought it the fitteſt time to write his own conditions.

a Kin. 18. 21.

Ezechias directed his three great Counſellers, to parly with Rabſaces over the Wall, and to receive his demands: who uſed three principall arguments to perſwade the people to yeeld themſelves to his Maſter Senacherib. For though the Chancellour, Steward, and Secretarie, ſent by Ezechias, deſired Rabſaces to ſpeak unto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the Jewiſh, yet he with a louder voice directed his ſpeech to the multitude in their own language. And for the firſt, he made them know, That if they continued obſtinate, and adhered to their King, that they would in a ſhort time be inforced to eat their own dung, and drink their own urine: Secondly, hee altogether diſabled the King of Egypt, from whom the Judæans hoped for ſuccour; and compared him to a broken ſtaffe, on which whoſoever leaneth, pierceth his own hand: Thirdly, that the gods who ſhould help them, Ezechias had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by ſome) the braſen Serpent, which had been preſerved ever ſince Moſes time: and withall hee bade them remember the gods of other Nations, whom, notwithſtanding any power of theirs, his Maſter had conquered and thrown down; and for God himſelfe, in whom they truſted, hee perſwaded them by no means to rely upon him, for hee would deceive them. But finding the people ſilent (for ſo the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had underſtood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, hee himſelf left the Aſſyrian forces in charge to others, and ſought Senacherib at Libna in Judæa, either to inform him of their reſolution in Jeruſalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Armie of Tarhaca the Arabian. Soon upon this there came letters from Senacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly adviſed, and partly threatned to ſubmit himſelf, uſing the ſame blaſphemous outrage againſt the all-powerfull God, as before. But Ezechias ſending thoſe Counſellers to the Prophet Eſay, which had lately been ſent to Rabſaces, received from him comfort, and aſſurance, that this heathen Idolater ſhould not prevaile; againſt whom the King alſo beſought aide from Almightie God, repeating the moſt inſolent and blaſphemous parts of Senacheribs letter, before the

The reason that moved Senacherib to desire to possesse himself in haste of Jerusalem, was, that he might thereinto have retraited his Armie, which was departed as it seemeth from the siege of Pelusium in Egypt, for fear of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are silent of that enterprise (which in these books of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speak but of the affairs of the Jews in effect) yet the ancient Berosus, and out of him Josephus and Saint Hierom, together with Herodotus, remember it as followeth. Herodotus calleth Senacherib King of Arabia and Assyria: which he might justly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead over Jordan, and the rest of Arabia Petræa adjoyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Egypt, to be Vulcans Priest; and reporteth that the reason of Senacheribs return from Pelusium in Egypt, which he also besieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rats had in one night eaten in sunder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoyled the rest of their weapons in that kind, which no doubt might greatly amaze him: but the approach of Tarhaca, remembred by Josephus and Berosus, was the more urgent. Saint Hierome upon the seven and thirtieth of Esay, out of the same Berosus, as also in part out of Herodotus, whom Josephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words lye, reports Senacheribs retrait in these words. Pugnasse autem Senacherib Regem Assyriorum contra Ægyptios, & obsedisse Pelusium, jamque extructis aggeribus urbi capiendæ, venisse Taracham Regem Æthiopum in auxilium, & una nocte juxta Jerusalem, centũ octoginta quinque millia exercitus Assyrii pestilentia corruisse, narrat Herodotus: & planissime Berosus (fabulosa scriptor Historiæ, quorum fides de propriis libris petenda est) That Senacherib King of the Assyrians fought against the Ægyptians, and besieged Pelusium, and that when his Mounts were built for taking of the Citie, Tarhacas King of the Æthiopians came to help them, and that in one night, neer Jerusalem, one hundred eightie five thousand of the Assyrian Armie perished by pestilence; of these things (saith Hierome) * Herodotus reports: and more at large Berosus a writer of Chaldæan Stories, whose credit is to be taken from their own Books. Out of Esay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assyrian Armie was in this manner: Thou shalt be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noyse, a whirlwind and a tempest, and a flame of devouring fire. But Josephus hath it more largely out of the same Berosus, an authoritie (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted, Senacheribus autem ab Ægyptiaco bello revertens, offendit ibi exercitum suum sub Rabsacis imperio reliquerat pene diminutus immissa delectum, primâ nocte posteaquam Urbem oppugnare cœperat, absumptis cum Ducibus & Tribunis centum octoginta quinque millibus Militum; qua clade territus, & de reliquis copiis sollicitus, maximis itineribus in regnum suum contendit, ad regiam quæ Ninus dicitur. With which destruction being terrified, and withall affraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, he made great marches into his Kingdome, to his Royall Citie, which is called Ninus, where shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sons, Adramelech and Selenner or Sharezer, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to Arasces, or Nesroth, *Whom he especially worshipped. What this Nesroth was, it is uncertain: Hierome in his Hebrew traditions hath somewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certain, that Venus Urania was worshipped by the Assyrians; and so was Jupiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witnesse. Many fancies there are, what cause his Sons had to murther him; but the most

§. III.

Of Ezechias his sickness and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

AFter this marvellous deliverie, Ezechias sickned, and was told by Isaiah that he must dye: but after he had besought God with tears for his delivery, Isaiah, as he was going from him, returned again, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recovery after three days, and a prolongation of life for fifteen years. But Ezechias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth for a 4 Kin. 20. sign to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isaiah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it self the contrary way, and went back ten degrees, upon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moved Ezechias to lament (saith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no son, and then in despair that the Messias should come out of the house of David, or at least of his Seed. His disease seemeth to be the pestilence, by the medicine given him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figs, layd to the Botch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wise-men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezechias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezechias shewed him all the Treasure he had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaiah, who told him; The daies
Esay. 39. are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and whatsoever thy Fathers have layd up in store to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall be left, saith the Lord. It may seeme strange, how Ezechia should have got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the year before. But the spoyl of the same Senacherib his Camp repayed all with advantage, and made Ezechia richer upon the sudden than ever he had been: which unexpected wealth was a strong temptation to boasting. After this time Ezechia had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made unto his life, he dyed having reigned nine and twentie years. One only offensive War he made, which was against the Philistims, with good successe. A-Eccluſ 48. mong his other acts (shortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) he devised to bring water to Jerusalem.

In two respects they say that he offended God: the one, that he rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemie; the other, that he so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbear to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moved Ezechias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassadours of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recovery of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakned the house of Senacherib, his fearfull enemy. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant under Senacherib in Babylon, usurped that State himself, in the last year of that King, and held it by strong hand against his son Assarhaddon; who was not only simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembring that their ancestor Phul Belochus had set his own Master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himself to take the opportunitie which this Kings weakness did offer, as it had been for Belochus to make use of the others wickedness: and so, finding himself beloved of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and prevailed. The assertion of this historie is made by the same arguments that were used in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here again rehearse. So of this new race, which cut a-sunder the Line of Ninus, there were only five Kings.

But forasmuch as the last year of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his son, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to have been an hundred and one years, of which, the last five and twenty were spent with Ezechia, under Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assarhaddon.

§. IIII.

The Kings that were in Media during the reign of Ezechia: Of the difference found between sundrie Authors in rehearsing the Median Kings. Other contemporaries of Hezechia: Of Candaules, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercules.

IN the time of Ezechia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, reigned in Media. Whether it were so, that varietie of names, by which these Kings were called in severall Histories, hath caused them to seem more than indeed they were; or whether the sons reigning with the fathers, have caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time wherein they governed Media, to exceed the due proportion; or whether the Copies themselves of Ctesias and Annius his Metasthenes, have been faulty, as neither of these two Authors is over-highly commended of trustinesse; so it is, that the names, number, and length of reign, are all very diversly reported of these Median kings, that follow Arbaces: therefore it need not seem strange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezechia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is found in those writers that varie from Eusebius, is more than I dare undertake. I will only here set down the roll of Kings that reigned in Media, accordingly as sundry Authors have delivered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their reigns thus;

Mercator hath laboured, with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasmuch as it seems to me an impossible matter, to attain unto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures founded upon Cteſias and Metaſthenes, I will lay the burden upon Euſebius, who lived in an age better furniſhed than ours, with books of this argument. Let it therefore ſuffice, that theſe two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Euſebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not ſtay to ſearch. The Kings of Media, according to Euſebius, reigned in this order.

These names, and this courſe of ſucceſſion I retain; but adde unto theſe, Cyaxares, the ſon of Aſtyages, according to Xenophon; and ſometimes follow Herodotus, in ſetting down the length of a Kings reign, otherwiſe than Euſebius hath it: of which variations I will render my reaſons in due place.

The twenty nine years of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the four firſt that were choſen Governours of Athens for ten years, that is, of Charops, Æſimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the firſt of theſe I hear nothing, ſave that Rome was built in his firſt year; of which perhaps himſelf did not hear. Of the ſecond and third I find only the names. The fourth made himſelf known by a ſtrange example of juſtice, or rather of cruelty, that he ſhewed upon his own Daughter. For he finding that ſhe had offended in unchaſtity, cauſed her to be lockt up with an Horſe, giving to neither of them any food: ſo the Horſe, conſtrained by hunger, devoured the unhappy Woman.

In Rome, the firſt King, and founder of that City Romulus, did reign both before, and ſomewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the laſt King ruled in the ſame age.

This Region was firſt called Maonia. Lydus the ſon of Atys reigning in it, gave the name of Lydia, if we believe ſuch authority as we find. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred upon Argon, who came of Alceus the ſon of Hercules, by Fardana, a bond-woman. The race of theſe Heraclidæ continued reigning fifty five years (in which two and twenty Generations paſſed) the ſon continually ſucceeding the father. Candaules the ſon of Myrſus was the laſt of his race, who doated ſo much upon the beauty of his own wife, that he could not be content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges the ſon of Daſcylus to behold her naked body; and placed the unwilling man ſecretly in her chamber, where he might ſee her preparing to bedward. This was not ſo cloſely carried, but that the Queen perceived Gyges at his going forth, and underſtanding the matter, took it in ſuch high diſdain, that ſhe forced him the next day to requite the Kings folly with treaſon. So Gyges being brought again into the ſame chamber by the Queen, ſlew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He reigned thirty eight years, beginning in the laſt of Ezekia, one year before the death of Romulus.

After Gyges, his ſon Ardys reigned nine and forty years; then Sadyattes twelve; Halyattes, fifty ſeven; and finally Cræſus the ſon of Halyattes, fourteen years: who loſt the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Perſia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Cræſus his Progenitor diſpoſeſt, are deduced from Hercules, ſo of the ſame Hercules there ſprang many other Kings, which governed ſeverall Countreys very long; as in Aſia, the Myſians; in Greece, the Lacedæmonians, Meſſenians, Rhodians, Corinthians and Argives; and from the Argives, the Macedonians, as likewiſe from the Corinthians, the Syracuſans: beſides many great and famous, though private Families.

But of the Heraclidæ that reigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my ſelf to take notice of the time of their ſeverall reigns: for little is found of them beſide the bare names, and the folly of this laſt King Candaules.

Chap. XXVI.

Of the Kings that reigned in Egypt, between the deliverance of Israel from thence, and the reign of Ezekiah in Juda, when Egypt and Juda made a league against the Assyrians.

That many names of Egyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to have belonged onely to Viceroyes. An example proving this out of William of Tyre his Historie of the Holy Warre.

THe emulation and quarrels arising in these times, between the mightie Kingdomes of Egypt and Assyria, doe require our pains, in collecting the most memorable things in Egypt, and setting down briefly the state of that Countrey, which had continued long a flourishing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Assyria for the masterie. Of Cham the son of Noah, who first planted that Countrey, and of Osiris, Orus, and other antient Kings that reigned there, untill the Israelites were thence delivered, more hath been said alreadie than I can stand to; though I hold it no shame to fail in such conjectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must here again help me. For it may truly be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are said to have reigned in Egypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Joseph was, and such as were the Soldans in later ages. Therefore I will not onely forbear to seek after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned up, from the mouths of Egyptian Priests, delivering them by number, without rehearsing their names; but will save the labour of marshalling them in order, whose names onely are found; the years of their reigns, and other circumstances proving them to have been Kings indeed, being not recorded.

But that I may not seem before hand to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what I list; it were not amisse, to give unto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historie doth afford. First therefore, we ought not to believe those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, to magnifie their Antiquities. For we know, that from Abraham our Saviour Christ was removed onely forty two descents; which makes it evident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not have passed away twice as many successions in Egypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, having reigned longer than forty years. It follows that we should square the number of the Egyptian Kings in some even proportion, to those which did bear rule in other Countries. As for the rest whose names we find scattered here and there; any man that will take the pains to read the nineteenth book of the Holy War, written by William Archbishop of Tyre, may easily perswade himself, that it is not hard to find names enow, of such as might be thought to have reigned in Egypt, being none other than Regents or Viceroyes. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose, for the pleasure and information of such as will not trouble themselves with turning over many Authors.

When Elabdech the Caliph ruled in Egypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtle man, made himself Soldan, by force and cunning, chasing away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrel to Amalrick king of Jerusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an invasion, which Amalrick made upon Egypt. Hereupon he grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partie good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Egypt.

Briefly,

Briefly, Sanar sueth to Noradine, King of Damasco, for aid, who sends an Armie of his Turks, under the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The victorie was Dargans; but he enjoyed it not: for in few dayes after, he was slain by treason, whereby Sanar did recover his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the kindred and friends of Dargan, that he could find in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadech gave little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the administration of the kingdome, whilest he might have the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would think) do neerly touch the Caliph himself. Syracon with his Turks, whom Sanar had gotten to come into Egypt, will not now be intreated there to leave him, and quietly go their way home. They seize upon the Town of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrivall of more companie from Damasco, for the conquest of all Egypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and finds himself not strong enough to expell them, much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie that was likely to second them: He therefore sends Messengers to King Almarick of Jerusalem, whom with large promises he gets to bring him aid, and so drives out the Turks. Of all this trouble the great Caliph hears nothing, or not so much as should make him look to the playing of his own game.

A greater mischief ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly in his own Title. Syracon, Captain of the Turkes that had been in Egypt, goes to the Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of Egypt, each of them claiming as heir to Mahomet that false Prophet, the Soveraigntie over all that were of the Saracen Law) and tels him the weaknesse of the Egyptian, with his own abilitie of doing service in those parts; offering his best means for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Western parts, under the subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Eastern Provinces are up in Arms, and Syracon, with a mighty power, descendeth into Egypt. The noyse of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almarick, that with all his forces he hasteth into Egypt, well knowing how neerly it concerned him and his Kingdome of Jerusalem, to keep the Saracens from joyning all under one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiving the faithfull care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselfe in giving them all manner of content, as it behoved him: for by their admirable valour, he finally drave the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victory was not so soon gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strange it is (which most concerns our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seems to know nothing. May we not think him to have been King in title onely, who meddled so little in the Government? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose help all was lost) could not well stay so long as his necessities required, makes large offers to King Almarick, upon condition that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre calls it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Pension) which the Kings of Jerusalem should receive out of Egypt, for this behovefull assistance. But the Christians understanding that the Soldan (how much soever he took upon him) was subject to a higher Lord, would make no bargain of such importance with any other than the Caliph himself. Hereupon Hugh Earl of Caesarea, and a Knight of the Templers, are sent unto Elhadech to ratifie the covenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Caliph and his estate.

These Embassadours were conveighed by the Soldan to Cairo, where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troups of Souldiers. The first entrance was through dark Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Ethiopians, which with all diligence did reverence to the Soldan as he passed along. Through these streights the Warders led them into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retain the gravitie of Embassadours, but were inforced to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they saw goodly Marble Pillars, gilded Beams, all wrought over with embossed workes, curious pavements, fish-ponds of Marble with clear waters, and many sorts of strange birds, unknown in those parts of the World, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then was undiscovered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuches conveyed them into other Courts within these, as far excelling the former, as the former did surpasse ordinarie houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearse how the further they entred, the more high state they found, and cause of marvaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrote these things, was never held a vain Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliphs own lodgings, which were yet more stately and better guarded; where entring the Presence, the Soldan having twice prostrated himself, did the third time cast off his Swood that he wore about his neck, and throw himself on the ground before the curtain, behind which the Caliph sate. Presently the traverse wrought with Gold and Pearle was opened, and the Caliph himself discovered, sitting with great majesty on a throne of gold, having few of his most inward Servants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kissed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he made unto King Almerick, desiring the Caliph himself to ratifie them in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly perform all which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would have him to give his hand upon the bargain; which the Egyptians that stood by thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnesse condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earl of Casaria saw that the Caliph gave his hand neither willingly nor bare, he told him roundly thus much in effect: Sir, Truth seeks no holes to hide it self; Princes that will hold covenant, must deal openly, nakedly and sincerely; Give us therefore your bare hand, if you mean that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargain with your Glove. Much adoe there was about this: for it seemed against the Majesty of such a Prince to yeeld so far. But when it would none otherwise be, with a smiling chear (though to the great grief of his Servants) he vouchsafed to let the Earl take him by the bare hand; and so rehearsing the covenants word by word, as the Earl spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors with such rewards as testified his greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may discern the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we see a Prince of great estate, sitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the mean season, using all Royall power, making War and Peace; entertaining and repelling Armies of strangers; yea, making the Land of Egypt tributary to a forrain Prince. What greater authority was given to Joseph, when Pharaoh said unto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings throne will I be above thee. Behold I have set thee over all the Land of Egypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approve the conjecture of mine Author, where he thinks, that the Egyptians, ever since Josephs time, have felt the burden of that servitude which he brought upon them, when he bought them and their Lands for Pharaoh. Herein I find his judgement good; that he affirms this manner of the Egyptian Kings in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customs practised by the Pharaohs. For we find, that even the Ptolomies (excepting Ptolomeus Lagi, and his son Philadelphus, founder and establisher of that race) were given, all of them wholly, to please their own appetites, leaving the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other Ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Country afforded, were indeed sufficient to invite the Kings thereof unto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Egyptians held their Princes, gave them security, whereby they might the better trust their Officers with so ample commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroys governing Egypt, is set down by Moses, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre, who lived in the same age, was in few years after Chancellour of the Kingdome of Jerusalem, and had full discourse with Hugh Earl of Casaria touching all these matters. Wherefore it remains, that we be not carried away with a vain opinion, to beleeve that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Egyptians have honoured with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of such, as we find by circumstance, likely to have reigned in that Country; after whom it follows that we should make inquiry.

§. II.

Of Acherres, whether he were Uchoreus that was the eighth from Osymandyas. Of Osymandyas and his Tombe.

IN this businesse I hold it vain to be too curious. For who can hope to attain to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius from both of them; and late Writers that have sought to gather the truth out of these and others, find no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annius would doe good service, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doe either say nothing, or that which may justly be suspected. I will therefore hold my self contented with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Isis, Orus, and those antiquities removed so far out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Israel out of Egypt, it shall suffice that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eusebius have not been silent, and that Reinecc ius hath taken paine to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or else found scattering in others.

From the departure of Israel out of Egypt, unto the reign of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I set down the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to every one the same length of reign.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded unto Chencres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seems to Reinecc ius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Uchoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King named Osymandyas, from whom Uchoreus is said to be the eighth; it will either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reinecc ius conjectures) was the great Osymandyas, or else that this Acherres was Uchoreus: for the distance between them was more than eight generations. Mercator judgeth Osymandyas to have bin the husband of Ancheres, Orus the seconds daughter, thinking that Manethon (cited by Josephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wife into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wives right. As for Uchoreus, it troubles not Mercator to find him the eighth from this man: for he takes Ogdoas, not to signifie in this place of Diodore (as that Greek word else doth) the eighth, but to be an Egyptian name, belonging also to Uchoreus, who might have had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vexe my brains in the unprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Osymandyas, was wrought upon his monument, the most thereof in figures, which I think the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was portrayed a great Army, with the siege of a Town, the captivity of the people, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly piece of work, which Diodore so particularly describes, to have been erected for a common place of buriall to the ancient Kings and Queens of Egypt, and to their Viceroys; whilst yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his own particular monument, striving therein to exceed all others. This appears by the many statues therein placed, by the Wars, the judgement seat, the receiving of Tribute, the offering sacrifice to God, the account of revenues, & plenty of all cattell and food; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the severall Offices of a Governour. On the Tomb of Osymandyas was this inscription. I am Osymandyas King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lye, let him exceed some of my works. Let them that hope to exceed his works, labour to know what he was. But since by those words, Or where I lye, it should seem that he lay not there interred, we may lawfully suspect that it was Joseph, whose body was preserved among the Hebrews, to be buried in the land of Canaan, and this empty Monument might King Orus, who outlived him, erect in honor of his high deserts, among the royall sepulchres. To which purpose the plenty of Cattel, & all manner of viands, had good reference. The name of Osymandyas doth not hinder this conjecture; seeing Joseph had one new name given to him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dream, and might, upon further occasions, have another, to his increase of honour. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerberg, as the Turkish Bassaes are called, that is, Great above the Great.

Now

Now although it be so, that the reckoning fals out right, between the times of Joseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that reigned after the great Orus, whose Viceroy Joseph was) yet will I hereby seek, neither to fortifie mine own conjecture, as touching Joseph, nor to infer any likelihood of Acherres his being Uchoreus. For it might well be, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gehoar, Lieutenant unto the Caliph Elcain; who having to his Masters use conquered Egypt, and many other Countries, did build, not far from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistresse, though he himself were a Dalmatian slave. John Leo. Hist. Africa. l. 1. & l. 8.

§. III.

Of Cherres, Armeus, Rameses, and Amenophis. Of Myris, and the Lake that bears his name.

WHen Acherres had reigned eight years, Cherres succeeded and held the kingdome fifteen years: then reigned Armeus five years, and after him Rameses threescore and eight. Of Armeus and Rameses is that Historie understood by Eusebius, which is common among the Greeks, under the names of Danaus and Ægyptus. For it is said that Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fifty Daughters, whom upon seeming reconciliation, he gave in marriage to his brothers fiftie sons, but commanded every one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermnestra, one of his Daughters, did save her husband Lynceus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudy sisters, when they dyed, were enjoyned this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking vessell with water.

The reign of Danaus in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus was Danaus, and Rameses, Ægyptus, is more than Reineccius believes: he rather takes Armeus to have been Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which bears his name. For my own part, as I can easily believe, that he which fled out of Egypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so do I not find how in so short a reign, as five years, a work of that labour could be finished, which was required unto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his own Sepulchre and his wives being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is uncertain, and of whose reigns we have no assurance, I may truly say, that their great works are not enough to prove them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deeds or more absolute, than were those of Joseph, who bought all the people of Egypt as bondmen, and all their land for bread; of Gehoar, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrey Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set down the length of their reigns whom we find to have followed one another in order of succession: but in rehearsing the great acts which were performed, I will not stand to examine, whether they that did them were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris, is, by the report of Diodore and Herodotus, three thousand six hundred furlongs in compasse, and fifty fadomes deep. It served to receive the waters of Nilus, when the overflow, being too great, was harmfull to the Countrie: and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the lake, when the river did not rise high enough. In opening the sluces of this lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the lake it self defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed upon fish taken therein was every day one talent, which Myris gave to his Wife to buy sweet ointments and other ornaments for her body. In the middest of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchres of Myris and his Wife, and over each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; having on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I find not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians: yet it is very great. The years of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inserting one Armesis (whom Eusebius omits) that should have reigned one year and odde moneths of the time: but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After

After Rameſſes, his ſon Amenophis held the Kingdome forty yeats. Some give him only nineteen years; and Mercator thinks him to have been the King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have already ſpoken in the firſt Book.

§. IV.

Of the Kings that reigned in the Dynaſtie of the Larthes.

Sethoſis, or Zethus, reigned after his Father Amenophis, fifteen years. To him are aſcribed the famous acts of that antient Seſoſtris. But the ſtate of the world was not ſuch at theſe times, that ſo great an expedition as the old Seſoſtris made, could have been either eaſily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paſſed, had it now been performed; as any man will perceive, if he look upon my Chronologicall Table, and conſider who lived with this Zethus. With this King began the Dynaſtie of the Larthes; which Reineccius conjectures to have had the ſame ſignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iſſued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have ſignified as much as Imperator or General. The wars in which theſe Kings were Generals, I take to have been againſt the Æthiopians: for ſure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Paleſtina, that lay next unto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they travelled over the deſart ſands on the other hand, to ſeek matter of conqueſt, in the poor Countries of Africa. But theſe Generals (if the Larthes were ſuch) were not many. Five only had that title, and the laſt of theſe took it, perhaps, as hereditarie from the firſt, in ſuch ſort as the Roman Emperours were proud, for a while, to be called Antonini, till the moſt unſutable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his ſucceſſors forbear the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynaſties (as appears by this particular) took name from the Kings; that the Kings alſo did adminiſter the government themſelves, and that therefore I am deceived in aſcribing ſo much unto the Viceroyes. But it is to be conſidered, that what is ſaid of theſe Larthes, depends only upon conjecture, and that the authoritie of the Regents, or Viceroyes, might be great enough, though ſome few Kings took the conduct of Armies into their own hands. John Leo 8. For ſo we find in John Leo, that the Soldan of Egypt (after ſuch time as the Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soveraigntie to himſelf) had under him a Viceroy, ſtiled Eddagnadare, who had authoritie to place, or diſplace, any Magiſtrates, or Officers; and that this mans Famile was almoſt as great as the Soldans own. Yet was there alſo the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might, as he thought good, ſpend of the Soldans treaſure. So might the office of the Viceroys continue, though the Kings themſelves, taking the charge, or title of Generals upon them, did ſomewhat abridge the greatneſſe of that ſecond place. As for the names of the Dynaſties, it skils not whence they were drawn; whether from their Countrey, as thoſe of the Thebans and Diapolitans; or from ſome eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time; as many think, that the ſeventeenth Dynaſtie was called of the Shepheards, becauſe Joſeph governed in part thereof; or from the Kings themſelves that reigned, as this was ſaid to be of the Larthes or Generals. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, forſmuch as Vaphres, and Seſac, reigned therein, if many others did not. But let us now return to the buſineſſe which we left.

Rameſes was King after Zethus, or Sethoſis, threeſcore and ſix years. He is miſtaken for that ſecond Seſoſtris, of whom I have ſpoken in the firſt book. I find nothing worth rehearſall of this Rameſes, or of Amenophis and Annemenes, that followed him in order; the former of which reigned fortie, the latter ſix and twenty years. Wherefore it may very well be, that the name which Zethus had from valour, was taken by theſe as hereditarie.

Thuoris, the laſt of the Larthes, reigned only ſeven years; yet is he thought to have bin that Proteus, of whom Herodotus hath mention ſaying, That he took Helena from Paris, and after the ſack of Troy, reſtored her to Menelaus. I need ſay no more in refutation of this, than that the time of Thuoris his reign laſted not ſo long as from the Rape of Helen to her reſtitution.

This

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others, mentioned by Greek Writers in this businesse, or in other such matters, may seem to be under-Officers: for such only are like to have had their residence about Pharos, and the sea-coast where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is said that he could foretell things to come, and that he could change himself into all shapes: whereby is signified his crafty head, for which he is grown into a Proverb. The Poets feigned him a Sea-God, and keeper of Neptunes Seal-fishes, for belike he was some under-Officer to the Admirall, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was said before.

Remphes the son of Proteus is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long tale fit to please children, of his covetousnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning thiefe, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may believe what he list. How long this King reigned I know not, nor think that either he or his father did reign at all.

§. V.

Of the Egyptian Kings, whoses names are found scattering in sundry Authors, their times being not recorded. The Kings of Egypt, according to Cedrenus. Of Vaphres, and Sesac.

MAny other names of Egyptian Kings are found scattered here and there; as Tonepherfobis, of whom Suidas delivers onely the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepes, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Enenes, noted by occasion of a great Physician that lived under him; Ranchyris, recorded by the same Suidas for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as, that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gave name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Devill, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, desiring to know, who before him had been, or after him should be so mighty as himself. The answer or confession of the Devill was remarkable; which I find Englished in the translation of Plessis his work Of the trueness of Christian Religion. The Greek Verses are somewhat otherwise, and much more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one; which is this:

First God, and next The Word, and then The Spirit, Which Three be One, and joyn in One all Three:
Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence frail wight,
The man of Life unknown excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suidas had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not found somewhat more in Suidas than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the form of invocation which Thulis used, and that clause of his giving name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seems to me, in giving to this King such profound antiquity of reign. Indeed the very name of that book, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breed suspition of some imposture: but the Frierly stuffe that he allegeth out of it, is such as would serve to discredit himself, were it not otherwise apparent that he was a man both devout, and of good judgement in matters that fell within his compasse. I will here set down the list of old Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets down, is Mizraim the son of Cham. After him he finds many of a new race, deriving their pedegree thus: Nimrod the son of Chus was also called Orion, and further took upon him the name of the Planet Saturn, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his own Linage, and by her three sons; Picus, surnamed Jupiter, Belus, and Ninus. Picus chasing his father out of Assyria into Italie, reigned in his stead thirtie yeats, and then gave up that Kingdome to Juno his sister and wife, and to Belus his son: after which Belus, who reigned onely two years, Ninus had the Kingdome, and married his own Mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie to visit his old Father Saturn; Saturn forth-with resigned the Kingdome unto him. Picus Jupiter reigned in Italie threescore and two years, had threescore and ten Wives or Concubines, and about as many children: finally dyed, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete.

The Principall of Jupiters sons were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie: hee reigned in Italie, after his Father, five and thirty years, and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure, where, after the death of Misraim, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirty years. After Mercurie, Vulcan reigned in Egypt, four years and a half. Then Sol, the son of Vulcan, reigned twenty years and a half. There followed in order Sosis, Osiris, Orus and Thules, of whom we spake before: the length of their severall reigns is not set down. After Thules, was the great Sesostris King twenty years. His successor was Pharaoh, called Narecho, that held the Crown fiftie years, with which there passed from him the surname of Pharaoh, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set down as I find them: let their credit rest upon the Author.

Others yet we find, that are said to have reigned in Egypt, without any certain note, when, or how long: about whom I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vain curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, than of negligence, in omitting such as might have been added.

Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon, and Sesac, the afflicter of Reboboam, lead us again into fair way, but not far. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but we are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eusebius for it. These give us not the length of his reign; but we know that he lived in the times of David and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, took Gezar from the Canaanites, and gave it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her sake perhaps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sesac his son did favour the enemies of Salomon, who kept so many Wives and Concubines, besides this Egyptian Princesse. In the life of Reboboam all hath been written that I find of Sesac, excepting the length of his reign, which must have been six and twenty years, if he were that Smendis with whom Eusebius begins the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Clem. Strom. l. 1. Euseb. de Præp. Evang. l. 9. c. 4. 1 King. 9. 16. & 11. v. 18. 19, &c.

Now forasmuch as it would serve to no great purpose, that we knew the length of Sesac his reign, and of theirs that followed him, unlesse therewithall we knew the beginning of Sesac, upon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth year of Jehojakim king of Juda, in which Pharao Neco was slain, I reckon upwards the years of the same Neco, and of his Predecessors, unto the beginning of Sesac: by which accompt, the first year of Sesac is found concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons reign, and the twenty sixt of Sesac with the fifth of Reboboam, wherein Sesac spoyled the Temple, and dyed, enjoying the fruits of his Sacrilege no longer than Joas the Israelite, and Crassus the Roman did; who after him spoyled the Temple of Jerusalem.

To fill up the time between Sesac and Neco, I have rather taken those kings that I find in the Greek Historians, than them which are in Eusebius his Catalogue. For of those that are delivered by Eusebius, we find no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, save only of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appear to have been a King. Hereunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eusebius by Æthiopians, which got the kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appears by the Prophet Esay, that the Counsellors of Pharaoh did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, insomuch that they said of Pharaoh, I am the son of the wise, I am the son of the antient King. But that which overthrows the reckoning of Eusebius, is the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Juda. For though it please him well to see how the reigns of Josias and Neco meet by his computation, yet this indeed mars all, the reign of Josias being misplaced. This errour grows from his omitting to compare the reigns of the Kings of Juda with theirs of Israel: by which occasion Joram King of Israel, is made to reign three years after Ahazia of Juda; Samaria is taken by Salmanassar before Hezechia was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings have their beginnings placed in some other year of their collaterals than the Scriptures have determined.

§. VI. Of

Of Chemmis, Cheops, Cephrenes, and other Kings recited by Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, which reigned between the times of Rehoboam and Ezechia.

FOllowing therefore the Greek Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. Hee reigned fiftie yeares, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accounted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome upwards narrower and narrower to the top. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seven acres every way, and was about six acres high. It was of a very hard and durable stone, which had lasted, when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeares, without complaining of any injurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the reign of Chemmis, unto the age of Augustus Cæsar, wherein Diodore lived, are indeed a thousand yeares; which doth give the better likelihood unto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers doe testifie, that they have seen them yet standing.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his son Chabrens succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheops (who might be Chabreas) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have been brethren; but the length of their reignes may argue the latter to have been sonne to the former: for Cheops reigned fifty yeares; Cephrenes fifty sixe. These were, as Chemmis had been, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had over-laboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes for those that raised them; but the malice of the Egyptians is said to have cast out their bodies, & to have called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entituling a poore fellow to their works, was held to be the casting out of their bodies; otherwise it is hard to conceive how it might be, that they, who had not power to avoyd the like slavery laid upon them by the younger brother or sonne, should have power or leasure to take such revenge upon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale devised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father wanting money, did prostitute her, & that she getting of every man that accompanyed her, one stone, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that stood in the midst of the other three. Belike she was an insolent Lady, and made them follow their drudgery for her sake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument with the superfluity of her Fathers provisions. Diodor. l. 1. Herod. l. 2.

Mycerinus the son of Cephrenes reigned after his Father six yeares. He would have built as his fore-goers did, but prevented by death, finished not what he had begun. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheops and Cephrenes had kept shut. But an Oracle threatned him with a short life of six years only, because of this his devotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt should have been afflicted an hundred and fifty yeares, which thy Predecessors knew, and performed for their parts; but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou live but six yeares. It is very strange, that the gods should be offended with a King for his piety; or that they should decree to make a Country impious, when the people were desirous to serve them; or that they having so decreed, it should lye in the power of a King to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the gods to fail in taking full effect. But these were Egyptian gods. The true God was doubtlesse more offended with the institution of such Idolatry, than with the interruption. And who knowes whether Chemmis did not learn somewhat at Jerusalem in the last year of his Father Sesac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanity of his Egyptian superstition? Most sure it is, that his reign, and the reignes of Cheops and Cephrenes were more long and more happy than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, revelled away both dayes and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, he had changed his nights into dayes, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Devill, than the restitution of Idolatry durst then seem, when it could speed no better. I find in Reineccius fiftie years assigned to this King; which I verily beleeve to have bin some errour of the print, though I find it not corrected among other such oversights: For I know no Author that gives him so many years, and Reineccius himself takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next unto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speakes no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, & excelling his predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by divers Authors, as one that loved justice; and may be taken for that Bancheris whom Suidas commends in that kind: Eusebius reckons 44. years of his reign.

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Æthiopian followes in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus quit omitting Bocchorus, hath Asychis; who made a sharp law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paid. This Asychis made a Pyramis of brick, more costly and faire, in his own judgement, than any of those that the former Kings had raised. Besides this Asychis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, a blind man, before the Æthiopian. The reignes of these two are perhaps those many ages which the Egyptians, to magnifie their antiquities, accounted between Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but six yeares; and so long doth Functius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings between them both did govern. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it unprobable that the reignes of two Kings should have bin so soon spent; he may doe it by taking some yeares from Sethon or Psammiticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde unto these without subtracting from some other, would breed a manifest inconvenience: forasmuch as part of Sesac his reign, must have been in the fifth of Rehobham, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of Jehojakim, and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine own part, I like it better to allow six years only to these two Kings, than to lose the witnesse of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speak of Sennacheribs war, at which time Sethon was King of Egypt. I will not therefore adde years unto these obscure names; for by adding unto these men three years, we shall thrust the beginning of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Sennacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him in his Egyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great envie to leave both Asychis and Amysis out of the roll; which were easily done by placing Sesac lower, and extending his life yet six years further, or more (if the like abridgement shall be required of Psammiticus his reign) into the years of Rehoboam.

2 Chro. 12. v. 2

Of Sabacus the Æthiopian, who took the Kingdome from Amysis, it is agreed by the most, that he reigned fiftie years. He was a mercifull Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour upon malefactors; by whose toile he both got much wealth into his own hands, letting out their service to hire, and performed many works of more use than pomp, to the singular benefit of the Countrey. Zonoras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Hosea, the last King of Israel, made a league with him against Salmanassar, little to his good: for the Egyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his friendship could not preserve the Israelite from destruction.

It seemes, that the encroaching power of the Assyrian grew terrible to Egypt about these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar and Salmanassar having eaten so farre into Syria, in the reign of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies (for his reign began in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul himself did make the first entrance into Palestina. This caused So to animate the half-subdued people against their Conquerors; but the help which he and his Successor gave them was so faint, that Sennacheribs Embassador compared the Egyptian succour to a broken staff of Reed. Such indeed had Hosea found it, and such Ezechia might have found it, had he not been supported by the strong staff of him that ruleth all Nations with a rod of yron. It appeareth by the words of Rabsake, that the opinion was great in Juda, of the Egyptian forces, for Chariots and Horse-men; but this power, whatsoever it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Egypt it selfe, which So left unto Sethon his Successor, having now fulfilled the fifty years of his reign. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Egyptian Priests, concerning the departure of this King; saying, that he left the Countrey, and willingly retired into Æthiopia,

because it was often signified unto him in his dreams, by the god which was worshipped at Thebes, that his reign should be neither long nor prosperous, unlesse he slew all the Priests in Egypt; which rather than to do, he resigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Egyptian gods were of a strange quality, that so ill rewarded their servants, and invited Kings to doe them wrong. Well might the Egytians (as they likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chief gods had the property of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have feigned this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I think that it might be some device of the fearfull old man, who seeing his Realm in danger of an invasion, sought an honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with-drawing himself into Æthiopia, where he had bin bred in his youth. What if I should say, that the Æthiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the instigation of this man) raised an Armie against Senacherib, when he meant to invade Egypt within two or three years after: but I will not trouble my self with such enquirie. This I hold, that So, or Sethon was not indeed an Æthiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquity of Pharaohs house) but only so surnamed for his education, and because issuing from thence, he got the kingdome from Anysis, who was his opposite. The quiet and mild form of his government, his holding the kingdome so long without an Army, and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally he betook a private life, or whether he fore-went his life and kingdom at once being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speak of Sethon his next Successor, who is omitted by Diodore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a sure token of his having been King.

§. VII.

Of Sethon who reigned with Ezechia, and sided with him against Senacherib.

THe first year of Sethons reign falls into the twelfth of Ezechia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdoms of Assyria and Egypt, being then ingaged in a War, the issue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serve. The Assyrian had the better men of War; the Egyptian better provision of necessaries; the Assyrian more Subjects; the Egyptian more Friends: and among the new conquered half Subjects of Assur, many that were Egyptian in heart, though Assyrian in outward shew.

Of this last sort were Ezechia and his people; who knowing how much it concerned Thebes to protect them against his own great Enemy, preferred the friendship of so near and mighty a Neighbour, before the service of a terrible, yet far removed King. But herein was great difference between Ezechia and his Subjects: For the good King fixing his especiall confidence in God, held that course of policy, which he thought most likely to turn to the benefit of his Country; the multitude of Judea looking into the fair hopes which this Egyptian league promised, were puffed up with vain conceits, thinking that all was safe, and that now they should not need to fear any more of those injuries which they had suffered by the Assyrians, and so became forgetfull of God, trusting to themselfs, but not of him. The Prophet Esay complained much of this presumption; giving the people of Juda to understand, That the Egyptians were men, and not God, and their Horses flesh, and not spirit, that God himself should defend Israel upon repentance, and that Assur should fall by the sword, but not of man. As for the Egyptians (said the Prophet) they are vanity, and they shall help in vain, their strength is to sit still.

According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treaty of Confederacy that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and assurance was given to the Jews by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with such reports of Horses and Chariots, that they did not look (as Esay saith) unto the holy One of Israel, nor seek unto the Lord. But he was wiser.

After a while came Senacherib with his Army, & wakened them out of these dreams, for Sethon their good Neighbour, as near as he was, did seem far off, being unready, when his help was most needfull. It may seem that he purposed rather to make Palestina, than Egypt, the stage whereon this great War should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Assyrians and Jews, weakning one another, should yeeld unto him a fair fair advantage over both. Yet he fought with mony; for he sent Horses and Camels Esay 30.6. laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeed; for (besides that it seems by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried and fell into the enemies hands before any help appeared from Tirhaca,) all the strong Cities of Juda were taken by Senacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Jerusalem it self, which were in sore distresse, till the sword of God

Esay 31.9. and not of Man, defeated the Assyrian, who did go, for fear, to his Tower, that is, fled to Nineve, where he was slain.

Concerning this expedition of Senacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Egypt, where the men of War, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to bear arms in defence of him and their Countrie; that Sethon being Vulcan's Priest bemoaned himself to his god, who by dream promised to send him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, (which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelusium and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Camp of Senacherib by night, did so gnaw the bows, quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were fain the next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselves disarmed. In memory hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription, Let him that beholds me serve God. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priests, wherein how far they swarved from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their own King, it may easily be perceived. It seems that this Image of Sethon was fallen down, and the tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps the Priests did forbear to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the nation of the Jews was then well known to the world, whereof every child could have told how much falsehood had been mingled with the truth.

We find this history agreeable to the Scriptures, thus far forth; That Senacherib King of the Assyrians and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him: the Syrians, or peradventure some borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) lived in this age, made War upon Egypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did unto his Priest, happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he took his god now in so good a mood: For within three or four yeats before this, all the Priests in Egypt should have been slain, if a mercifull King had not spared their lives, as it were half against the gods will. Therefore this last good turn was not enough to serve as an example, that might stir up the Egyptians to pietie, seeing that their devotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I think, that this Image did represent Senacherib himself, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Egyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull issue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by means which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeed a very good motive to pietie. But the Emblem, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chief Temple in that Town where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable, the Devill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Devill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon finding himself in danger, did call upon his gods, that is, upon Vulcan, Serapis, or any to whom he had most devotion. But so had other of his predecessors done in the like need: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Jews (even such of them as most were given to Idolatrie) would have bin ashamed of Esay 31.1. the confidence which they reposed in the Chariots of Egypt, because they were many, & in the Horsmen, because they were very strong, had it bin told them, that Sethon, instead of sending those Horsmen and Chariots, was beseeching Vulcan to send him and them good luck; or else (for these also were Egyptian gods) addressing his prayers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoever it was, doubtlesse the Prophecie of Esay took effect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor help, nor do them good, but shall be a shame and also a reproach. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisdome, when resting secure upon provision which it self hath made, it will no longer seem to stand in need of God.

Some there are who take Sethon to have bin set down by Eusebius under the name of Tarachus the Æthiopian; and therefore the twenty years which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the reign of Sethon. These have well observed that Tarachus the Æthiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Egypt, but as a friend to that Country, or at least an enemy to Sennacherib, in the War last spoken of; the Æthiopians (as they are englished) over which he reigned, being indeed Chusites or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they think that this Tarachus or Tirhaka is placed in the room of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twenty years of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Æthiopian (as he is called) began his reign over Egypt, by Eusebius his accompt, after the death of Sennacherib and of Ezechia, in the first year of Manasses King of Juda. Therefore he or his years have no reference to Sethon.

Herodotus forgets to tell how long Sethon reigned; Funcius peremptorily citing no author, nor alleging reason for it, sets him down thirty three years; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded unto my self at the first, for measuring the reigns of these Egyptian Kings. The years which passed from the fifth of Roboboam, unto the fourth of Jehojakim, I so divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the portion allowed unto him by the Author in whom he is found, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of reign is uncertain; that is, upon this Sethon. By this accompt I find the thirty three years that are set down by Funcius, to agree very nearly, if not precisely, with the time of Sethon's reign; therefore I conform my own reckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one year lesse. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psammiticus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this History will shortly bring me, the Egyptian affairs growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Juda, to which it is meet that I return.

CHAP. XXVII.

Of Manasses and his Contemporaries.

§. I.

MAnasse the Son of Ezechias, forgetting the piety of his Father, and the prosperity which followed him, set up, repaired, adorned and furnished all the Altars, Temples and high Places, in which the Devill was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, he himself esteemed the Sun, the Moon, and the Stars, with all the Hoast of heaven, as gods, and worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his sons for a Sacrifice to the Devill Moloth or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhinnon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Devils.

He also gave himself to all kind of Witchcraft and Sorcery, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent blond, as Jerusalem was repleniished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverent Prophet Esay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Jews affirm, the Father-in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neer unto the Fountain of Siloe, to be sawn in sunder with a wodden Saw, in the eightieth year of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous than hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeed are silent hereof, yet the same is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isidore, Eusebius, and others, too many to rehearse, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captains of the Hoast of the Kings of Ashur, which took Manasse, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chains, and carried him to Babel: Where, after he had lyen twenty years as a captive, and dispayred of all honour and hope, yet to his hearty repentance and continuall prayer, the God of infinite mercy had respect, and moved the Assyrians heart to deliver him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loved his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his liberty and estate. After which, and when he was again established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed form, detested his former foolish and devillish Idolatry, and cast down the Idols of his own erecting, prepared the Altar of God, and sacrifised thereon. He repaired a great part of Jerusalem: and dyed after the long reign of fiftie five years. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manasse was held in a cage of yron by the Assyrians: and therein fed with bread of bran and water, which men may believe as it shall please their fancies.

§. II.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of Sethon. The reign of Psammiticus.

THat the wickednesse of King Manasses was the cause of the evill which fell upon his Kingdome and Person, any Christian must needs believe: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things in those parts of the World such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps invite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, upon respect born to his own ends, desirous to enlarge his Empire) to make attempt upon Juda. For the kingdom of Egypt, which was become the pillar whereon the state of Juda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civill dissention, and after two years ill amended by a division of the government between twelve Princes. After some good agreement between these, eleven of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himself absolute King of all. This Interregnum, or meer Anarchie that was in Egypt, with the division of the Kingdome following it, is placed by Diodore, who omitteth Sethon, between the reign of Sabacus and Psammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Aristocratie, or twelve Governours immediatly before Psammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this dissention seems to have bin the uncertainty of title to that Kingdom (for that the crown of Egypt passed by succession of blond, I have often shewed) which ended for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not setled untill one had obtained the Soveraignty.

These twelve Rulers governed fifteen years in good seeming agreement, which to preserve, they made strait covenant & alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drink-offering in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. While st this unity lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built near unto the Lake of Meris, a work so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beholding it, affirms) no words could give it commendation answerable to the stateliness of the work it self. I will not here set down that unperfect description which Herodotus makes of it, but think enough to say that he prefers it far before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest works in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to have bin the work of Marus or Menides, a King which lived five generations before Proteus, that is, before the War of Troy, and from this Labyrinth (saith he) Dedalus took the pattern of that which he made for Minos in Crete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reinecc. takes him to have bin Amenemes, which reigned immediatly before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dedalus & Minos were both dead long before Amenemes was King. Belike Reinecc. desiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Chaeremon, & others, that are found in Josephus, touching Amenophis & his children, to the story of Amasis & Actisanes the Aethiopian mentioned by Diodore, held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethons Amenophis to be Diodorus his Amasis, that Sethos should be Actisanes, and that Amenemes should be Marus. If in this case I might intrude a conjecture, the times which we now handle are those about which Reinecc. hath erred in making search; Amasis was Amasis, Actisanes was Sabacus; & Marus was one of these twelve Princes to whom Herodotus gives

the honour of building this famous Labyrinth. For Actisanes the Æthiopian deposed Amasis, Sabacus the Æthiopian deposed Anysis; Actisanes governed well, and was mild in punishing offenders; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Actisanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (saving Sethon, whom Diodore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabacus, performed the same work, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to hear the truth, as living nearer to the Age wherein it was performed. The variety of names, and difference of times wherein Diodore beleeved the Priests, might be a part of the Egyptian vanity, which was familiar with them in multiplying their Kings, and boasting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelve great Halls, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe help to prove that it was the work of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemn feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drink-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleven Cuppes. Hereupon, Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, took off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplyed the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traytor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him upon set purpose or ill intent, they forbare to kill him, but being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the event is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleeve to have bin none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Psammiticus hired Souldiers out of Caria and Ionia, by whose aid he vanquisht his Companions, and made himself sole King.

The years of his reign, according to Herodotus, were fiftie four; according to Eusebius, forty four; Mercator, to reconcile these two, gives fortie four years to his single reign, and ten to his ruling joyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeed, he that was admitted, being a man grown (for he cannot in reason be supposed to have been then a young fellow) into the number of the twelve Governous, must be thought to have lived unto extreme age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, three score and nine years. I therefore yeeld rather to Eusebius; but will not adventure to cut five years from the Aristocratie: though peradventure Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or as next of bloud) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and was ten years companion in that government.

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The years of the Egyptians, as we find them set down, are more by one, than serve to fill up the time between the fift of Rehoboam & the fourth of Jehojakim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one year from Sethons reign, that was of uncertain length, or else (which I had rather doe, because Funccius may have followed better authority than I know, or than himself allegeth, in giving to Sethon a time so nearly agreeing with the truth) we must confound the last year of one reign with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are set down in Chronologicall tables, reigned precisely so many years as are ascribed unto them, without any fractions: it is enough to think that the surplusage of one mans time supplyed the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last year of those fifteen, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Psammiticus, who surely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himself Lord alone all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Egypt who entertained any strait amity with the Greekes; that he retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom he gave large rewards and possessions; and that he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honourable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Upon this disgrace it is said, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, forsook their naturall Countrey of Egypt, and went into Æthiopia, to dwell there: neither could they be revoked by kind Messages, nor by the King himself, who over-took them on the way; but when he told them of their Countrey, their Wives and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrey, and that nature had enabled them to get other Wives and Children.

It

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such sort, as they might not hear any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out what Nation or Language was most ancient; forasmuch as it seemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speak that Language which men spake at the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cryed, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to signifie Bread in the Phrygian tongue, served greatly to magnifie the Phrygian antiquity. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker signifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne over any part of Goropius his works, may find enough of this kind, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarks used none other tongue than the Low-Dutch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it self of Babel being also Dutch; and given by occasion of this confusion; for that there they began to babble and talke one knew not what.

But I will not insist upon all that is written of Psammiticus. The most regardable of his acts was the siege of Azotus in Palestina, about which he spent nine & twenty years. Never have we heard (saith Herodotus) that any City endured so long a siege as this; yet Psammiticus carryed it at the last. This Town of Azotus had been won by Tartan a Captain of Sennacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, relieved, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out so well.

§. III.

What reference these Egyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of Manasses. In what part of his reign Manasses was taken prisoner.

WEre it certainly known, in what year of his reign Manasses was taken prisoner, and how long it was before he obtained liberty, I think wee should find these Egyptian troubles to have been no small occasion both of his captivity and enlargment: God so disposing of humane actions, that even they, who intended onely their own businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the civill Warres in Egypt that followed upon the death of Sethon, or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were, into twelve pieces, or the Warre betweene Psammiticus and his Collegues, or the expedition of Psammiticus into Syria, and the siege of Azotus, might minister unto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts, or such necessity of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his own, as would greatly tempt him to make sure worke with the King of Juda. The same occasion sufficed also, to procure the deliverie of Manasses, after he was taken. For he was taken (as Josephus hath it) by subtilty, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrey, but onely waste it. So that the Jewes, having learned wit by the ill successe of their folly, in redeeming Amazia, were like to be more circumspect, in making their bargain upon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Egyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of Juda could afford) had no reason to spend his forces in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficulty as a greater, whereby he should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quiting his present advantage over the Jewes, he might make his way the fairer into Egypt.

Now concerning the year of Manasses his reign, wherein he was taken prisoner; or concerning his captivity it self, how long it lasted, the Scriptures are silent, and Josephus gives no information. Yet I find cited by Torniellus three opinions; the one of Bellarmine, who thinks that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth year of his reign; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirmes, that it was in his twenty seventh year; the third of Rabbi Kimki upon Ezechiel, who saith, that he was forty yeares an Idolater, and lived fifteen yeares after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is upheld by Torniellus, who rejects the second, as more unprobable, and condemns the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such, as may rather prove him to favour the Cardinall as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely dissent from him) than to have used his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before he gave his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintain the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon the son of Manasses, is said by Josephus to have followed the works of his fathers youth; the other, that had Manasses grown old in his sins, it is like that hee should have continued, as hee did, in his amendment unto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason why the sins of Manasses might not be distinguished from his repentance in his old age by calling them works of his youth, which appeared when he was twelve yeare old; though it were granted that he continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimki) untill he was but fifteen years from death. Touching the second; howsoever it be a fearfull thing, to cast off unto the last those good motions unto repentance, which we know not whether ever God will offer unto us again; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sins which are not forsaken before the age of two and fifty years, shall be punished with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not unlikely, That Manasses continued longer in his wickednesse than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long as Rabbi Kimki hath affirmed. In the second book of Kings, the evill which Manasses did, is remembred at large, and his repentance utterly omitted; so that his amendment may seem to have taken up no great part of his life; the storie of him being thus concluded in the one and twentieth Chapter: Concerning the rest of the Acts of Manasses, and all that he did, and his sin that he sinned, are they not written in the book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Juda? The other place is in the four and twentieth Chapter of the same Book, where, in rehearsing the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Jehojakim, the great Grand-child of this Manasses, it is said, Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this upon Juda, that he might put them out of his sight, for the sins of Manasses, according to all that he did, and for the innocent blood that he shed (for he filled Jerusalem with innocent blood) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Who lo considers well these places, may find small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier than fifteen years before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty seven years old, he repented, and becomming a new man, lived in the feare of God forty years after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth cannot be discovered. It sufficeth to say, that two years of civill dissention in Egypt fourteen or fifteen years following, wherein that Kingdome was weakned by partition of the Soveraignitie: the warre of Psammitichus against his Associates: and four and twenty years of the nine and twenty, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leave no one part of his reign (after the first fifteen years) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continuall occasions of visiting his Countrey. All which I will adde hereto, is this, that the fifteenth of Manasses was the last year of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Meredach his reign, or (accounting from the death of Asarhaddon) the twentieth: The seven and twentieth of Manasses was the tenth of the twelve Princes; and the three and fortieth of Meradach: his fortieth, was the twenty third of Psammitichus, and the fift of Nabulassar, the son of Merodach, in Babylon: but which of these was the year of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbear to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seem to draw all matters over-violently to mine own computation.

2 King. 21.17.

2 Kin. 24.3.4.

This was the first great maistrie that the Babylonians had of the kingdome of Juda. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Salmanassar, yet Ezechias never payed it. True is it, that he hoped to stay Senacheribs enterprise against him, by presenting him with three hundred talents of silver, and thirty of gold, besides the plate which covered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

2 King. 18.

But Manasses being pressed with great necessitie, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Babylonian would impose upon him; among which it seems, that this was one, (which was indeed a point of servitude) that he might not hold peace with the Ethiops, whilest they were enemies to Babylon. This appears not onely by his fortifying with men of war all the strong Cities of Juda after his return (which was rather against Psammitichus, whose party he had forsaken, than against the Babylonian, with whom he had thenceforth no more controversie) but likewise by that opposition, which Josias made afterwards to Pharao Necho, in favour of Nabulassar, which had been against all reason reason and policie, if it had not been his duttie by covenant. Of this I will speak more in convenient place.

§. IV.

Of the first and second Messenian Wars, which were in the reigns of Ezechia and Manasses, Kings of Juda.

NOw concerning such actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasses, the most remarkable were the Messenian Wars; which happened in this age, and being the greatest action performed in Greece, between the Trojan and Persian Wars, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian War began and ended in the daies of Ezechia; the second in the reign of Manasses: but to avoyd the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is needlesse, than to say, that the posteritie of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops and the Achaans out of their seats, divided their lands between themselves, and erected the kingdomes of Lacedemon, Argos, Messene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, did afterwards forget the bond of kindred, and sought one anothers ruine with bloudy wars; whereof these Messenian were the greatest.

The pretended grounds of the Messenian war are scarce worth remembrance, they were so slight. Ambition was the true cause of it: wherewith the Lacedamonians were so transported, that any thing served them as a colour to accomplish their greedy desires. Yet other matter was alleged; namely, that one Polychares a Messenian had slain many Lacedamonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta desiring to have him yeelded into their hands, could not obtain it. The Messenians on the other side, excused Polychares, for that he was grown frantick, through injuries received from Euaphnes a Lacedæmonian. This Euaphnes had bargained to give pasture to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increase: but not contented with the gain appointed, he sold the Cattell, and slaves that kept them, to Merchants; which done, he came with a fair tale to his friend, saying, that they were stollen. Whilst the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the slaves that had escaped from the Merchants came in with a true report of all. The Lacedæmonian being thus deprehended, confessed all, and promised large amends; which to receive he carried the son of Polychares home with him; but having him at home, he villanously slew him. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians having refused, after long sute made by the wretched Father, to do him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell out of those things which he did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselvss had cast him. So said the Messenians, and further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand unto the judgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counsell of Greece, or to any other fair course. But the Lacedæmonians, who had a great desire to occupie the fair Countrie of Messene, that lay close by them, were not content with such allegations. They thought it enough to have some shew for their doings; which the better to colour, they reckoned up many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, secretly took an oath to hold war with Messene till they had mastered it: which done, they seized upon Amphia, a frontier Town of that Province, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercy, very few escaped.

Hereupon the Messenians took Arms, and were met by the Enemy. A furious battell was fought between them, which ended not untill dark night, with uncertain victory. The Messenians did strongly encamp themselves; The Lacedæmonians, unable to force their Camp, returned home. This War began in the second year of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twenty years. The two enemy Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedæmonians wasting the inland parts of Messene, and the Messenians, the Sea-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to help. The Arcadians, Argives, and Siconians, took part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their own, aid from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So the second, third, and fourth battell were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; saving that in the fourth battell the Lacedæmonians were enforced to turn their backs; in the other fights, the victory was still uncertain, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphaes their King, in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many years were spent ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of money to entertain Souldiers, caused the war to linger. And for the same reasons, did the Messenians forsake all their inland towns, excepting Ithome, which was a Mountain with a Town upon it, able to endure more than the enemies were likely to do. But, as some Authors tell us, the Lacedæmonians were so obstinate in this War, because of their vow, that having absented themselves ten years from Sparta, their wives sent them word, that their City would grow unpeopled, by reason that no children had been born them in all that time: Whereupon they sent back all their ablest young men, promiscuously to accompany the young women, who got so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorus refers the begetting of these Parthenians to a former time. But in processe of this Messenian War, when the Devill in an Oracle had advised the Messenians to sacrifise a Virgin of the stock of * Ægyptus, that so they might be victorious against the Lacedæmonians; the lot falling upon the Daughter of one Lyciscus, Epibolus the Priest, willing to save her, said, shee was only a fostered child, and not born of the wife of Lyciscus: which answer giving delay to the execution of the Maid, Lyciscus secretly fled away with her into Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his own Daughter: but a young Nobleman, being in love with the Maid, when otherwise he could not prevail, said openly that she was no Virgin, but that he had defloured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped up his innocent Daughters belly, to disprove the Lovers slander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, afterwards falling, by other superstitions, into dispair of prevailing against the Lacedæmonians, he slew himself, to the great hurt of his Countrey, which he loved most dearly. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselves distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craved peace, which they obtained with most rigorous conditions. Half the yearly fruits of their Land they were bound to send unto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make solemn lamentations at the death of every Spartan King; they were also sworn to live in true subjection to the Lacedæmonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was given to the Asmai, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

Diod. l. 15.

* This Ægyptus was the youngest son of Cresphon by Merope, the daughter of Cypselus King of Arcadia: of which Cresphon the chiefe Nobility of the Messenians was propagated.

This peace being made upon so uneven termes, was not like to hold long. Yet nine and thirty years it continued (the Messenians not finding how to help themselves) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre than the former. The able young men, that were grown up in the room of those Messenians whom the former Warre had consumed, began to consider their own strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedæmonians, and therefore scorned to serve such Masters as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chief of these was Aristomenes, a Noble Gentleman of the house of Ægyptus; who perceiving the uniform desires of his Countrie-men, adventured to become their Leader. He therefore sounding the affections of the Argives and Arcadians, which he found throughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre upon the State of Lacedæmon. This was in the fourth year of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedæmonians hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hot, with such forces as they could raise of their own, without troubling their friends, meaning to deal with their enemies, ere any succour were lent them. So a strong battell was fought between them, and a doubtfull; save that the Messenians were pleased with the issue, forasmuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords, to think them their equalls. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refusing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one year another battell was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedæmonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to help: the Messenians had the Argives, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Aristomenes did so behave himselfe, that finally he made the Enemies run for their lives. Of such importance was this victorie, that the Lacedæmonians began to bethink themselves of making some good agreement.

But one Tyrtæus an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they had gotten to direct them, re-inforced their spirits with his Verses. After this, Aristomenes took by surprise a Town in Laconia, and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of Sparta, who did set upon him in hope to have recovered the bootie.

But all those victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battell, whereof the honour (if it were honour) or surely the profit, fell upon the Lacedæmonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, King of Arcadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with money, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their principall Citie, all the Towns of Messene, standing to farre from the Sea, were abandoned for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not be safe abroad, was conveyed into a place of safetie. Here the Lacedæmonians found a tedious work, that held them eleven years. For besides that Era it selfe was a strong piece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the siege. He wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corn, Wine, Cattell, and all provisions, necessary for his own people; the Slaves and houshold stuffe hee changed into money, suffering the owners to redeem them. To remedy this mischief, the Lacedæmonians made an Edict, that neither Messene, nor the adjoyning parts of their own Countrey, should be tilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost undone by it. Yet the Poet Tyrtæus appeased this uproare with pleasing Songs. But Aristomenes grew so bold, that he not only ranged over all the fields, but adventured upon the Towns, surprised, and sackt Amycla, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared no likelihood of taking Era.

In performing these and other services, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner, yet still he escaped. One escape of his deserves to be remembred, as a thing very strange and marvellous. He had with too much courage adventured to set upon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deep natural Cave into which the Spartans used to cast head-long such as were condemned to dye for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Aristomenes and his companions adjudged. All the rest of these poor men dyed with their falls; Aristomenes (howsoever it came to passe) took no harm. Yet was it harm enough to be imprisoned in a deep Dungeon, among dead carcasses, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while he perceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the top) a Fox that was gnawing upon a dead body. Hereupon he bethought himself, that this beast must needs know some way to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold upon it, and catching it by the tail with one hand, saved himself from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coat into the mouth of it. So letting it creep whither it would, he followed, holding it as his guide, untill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Fox being loose, ran through an hole at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes delve so long with his nailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. When some fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale sounded alike, as if they had said, that a dead man was revived. But when the Corinthian forces that came to help the Lacedæmonians in the siege of Era, were cut in pieces, their Captains slain, and their Camp taken; then was it easily believed, that Aristomenes was alive indeed.

Thus eleven years passed, whilest the enemies hovering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slave that had fled from Sparta, betrayed the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rainie-winter-night, that the husband came home unlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hid her Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him by what good fortune hee was returned so soon. Hee told her, that the storm of foul weather was such, as had make all his fellows leave their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Aristomenes, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not look abroad; neither was it to be feared, that the enemies would ſtirre in ſuch a dark rainie night as this was. The ſlave that heard theſe tidings, roſe up ſecretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedæmonian Camp with the newes. There he found Emperamus his Maſter commanding in the Kings abſence. To him he uttered all; and obtaining pardon for his running away, guided the Army into the Town. Little or nothing was done that night. For the Allarm was preſently taken; and the extreme darkneſſe, together with the noiſe of wind and rain, hindred all directions. All the next day was ſpent in moſt cruell fight; one part being incited by meer hope of ending a long work; the other enraged by meer deſperation. The great advantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompenced partly by the aſſiſtance which women and children (to whom the hatred of ſervitude had taught contempt of death) gave to their husbands and fathers, partly by the narrowneſſe of the ſtreetes and other paſſages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Meſſenians were in continuall toyl; their Enemies fought in courſe, refreſhing themſelves with meat and ſleep, and then returning ſupplyed the place of their wearie fellowes with freſh Companions. Aristomenes therefore, perceiving that his men for want of relief were no longer able to hold out, (as having been three dayes and three nights vexed with all miſeries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger, and thirſt, beſides continuall rain and cold) gathered together all the weaker ſort, whom he compaſſed round with armed men, and ſo attempted to break out through the midſt of the Enemies. Emperamus Generall of the Lacedæmonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, cauſed his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a fair paſſage to theſe deſperate mad-men. So they iſſued forth, and arrived ſafe in Arcadia, where they were moſt lovingly entertained.

Upon the firſt bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themſelves to the reſcue: but Aristocrates their falſe-hearted King, ſaid it was too late, for that all was already loſt. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in ſafetie, he choſe out five hundred the luſtieſt of his men, with whom he reſolved to march in all ſecret haſt unto Sparta, hoping to find the Town ſecure, and ill manned, the people being runne forth to the ſpoyl of Meſſene. In this enterpriſe, if he ſped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedæmonians would be glad to recover their own, by reſtitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worſt that could happen. There were three hundred Arcadians that offered to joyn with him; but Aristocrates marred all, by ſending ſpeedie advertiſement thereof to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epiſtle which Anaxander ſent back to Aristocrates was intercepted by ſome that miſtruſted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falſhood, which being publiſhed in open aſſemblie, the Arcadians ſtoned him to death, and caſting forth his bodie unburied, erected a monument of his treachrie, with a note, That the Perjurer cannot deceive God.

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be ſaid, than that committing his people to the charge of his ſon Gorgus and other ſufficient Governors, who ſhould plant them in ſome new ſeat abroad, he reſolved himſelf to make aboad in thoſe parts, hoping to find the Lacedæmonians work at home. His daughters he beſtowed honourably in mariage. One of them Demageitus, who reigned in the Ile of Rhodes, took to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marry the daughter of the beſt man in Greece. Finally, Aristomenes went with his daughter to Rhodes, whence he purpoſed to have travelled unto Ardys the Sonne of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where he was honourably buried.

The Meſſenians were invited by Anaxilas (whoſe great Grandfather was a Meſſenian, and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italie, to take his part againſt the Zancleans in Sicilie, on the other ſide of the Streights. They did ſo, and winning the Town of Zancle, called it Meſſene, which name it keeps to this day.

This ſecond Meſſenian warre ended in the firſt yeare of the twentie eighth Olympiad. Long after which time, the reſt of that Nation, who ſtaying at home ſerved the Lacedæmonians, found meanes to rebell; but were ſoone vanquiſhed, and being driven to forſake Peloponneſus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewiſe, after few ages, they were expelled by the Lacedæmonians, and then followed their ancient Countrie-men into Italie and Sicilie; some of them went into Africa, where they chose unto themselves a seat.

It is very strange, that during two hundred and fourscore years, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, and love of their forsaken Country; with a desire to return unto it. In the third year of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedæmonians, revoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesus. There did Epaminondas restore unto them their old possession, and help them in building a fair Citie; which by the name of the Province, was called Messene, and was held by them ever after, in despight of the Lacedæmonians, of whom they never from thenceforth stood in fear.

§. V.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while Manasses reigned. Whether Deioces the Mede were that Arphaxad which is mentioned in the Book of Judith. Of the history of Judith.

Ardys King of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as reigning shortly after the Messenian war. Ardys succeeding unto his father Gyges, began his reign of nine and fortie yeares, in the second of the five and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steps of his father, who encroaching upon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wan Priene, and assailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his reign, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their own countrie by the Scythians, over-ran a great part of Asia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grandchild, by whom they were driven out. They had not only broken into Lydia, but wan the Citie of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long reign was unable, by reason of this great storm, to effect much.

Phraortes was not King untill the third year of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was six years after the Messenian war ended; the same being the last year of Manasses his reign over Juda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these five and fiftie yeares in which Manasses reigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict form, commanding more absolutely than his Predecessours had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people so much licence, as caused every one to desire the wholesome severitie of a more Lordly King. Herein Deioces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he took unto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldome gave presence; which also when he did, it was with such austeritie, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly upheld the Majestie which his predecessors had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did uprightly and severely administer justice, keeping secret spies to inform him of all that was done in the Kingdome. He cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching upon others, but studied how to govern well his own. The difference found between this King, and such as were before him, seems to have bred that opinion which Herodotus delivers, that Deioces was the first who reigned in Media. Herod. lib. 1.

This was he that built the great Citie of Ecbatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that king Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Judith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same account, should be Nabuchodonosor the Assyrian, by whom Arphaxad was slain, and Holofernes sent to work wonders upon Phul and Lud, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last yeare of Deioces to have been the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, some earlier, in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the reign of Nabulassar, who is also called Nabuchodonosor.

In

In fitting this book of Judith to a certain time, there hath much labour been spent with ill successe. The reigns of Cambyses, Darius Hystaspes, Xerxes, and Ochus, have been sought into, but afford no great matter of likelyhood: and now of late, the times foregoing the destruction of Jerusalem, have been thought upon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the story, though others herein cannot (I speak of such as fain would) agree with him. Whilst Cambyses reigned, the Temple was not re-built, which in the story of Judith is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes, are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Jews; therefore neither of these could be Nabuchodonosor, whose part they refused to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this History; and above all, the opinion of a few ancient Writers (without whose judgement the authority of this Book were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persian Monarchie, inclines the matter to the reign of this vain-glorious King. As for Ochus, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the businesse. Manifest it is, and granted, that in the time of this History, there must be a return from captivitie lately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; Joachim High Priest; and a long peace of threescore and ten years, or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to be among the Jews. Likewise on the other side, we must find a King that reigned in Nineve, eighteen years at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Jews refused to assist; one that sought generally to be adored as God, and that therefore commanded all temples, of such such as were accounted gods, to be destroyed; one whose Vice-roy or Captain Generall knew not the Jewish Nation, but was fain to learn what they were of the bordering people.

Of all these circumstances, the Priesthood of Joachim, with a return from captivitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Jerusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the re-building of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the reign of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before nor after the captivitie of the Jews, and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the brief decision of this controversie is, That the book of Judith is not Canonicall. Yet hath Torniellus done as much, in fitting all to the time of Ianus, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and repaired the Citie of Ecbatane, that had formerly been built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonosor might be another. This granted, he addes, that from the twelfth year to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, that is, five or six years, the absence and ill fortune of Xerxes in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have been so long) might give occasion unto Arphaxad, of rebelling: and that Nabuchodonosor, having vanquished and slain Arphaxad, might then seek to make himself Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth unto Holofernes. So should the Jews have done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their Soverain Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applied to the argument. For in these times, the affairs of Persie were agreeable to the History of Judith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough be ignorant of the Jews, and as proud as we shall need to think him. But the silence of all Histories, takes away belief from this conjecture: and the supposition it self is very hard, that a Rebell, whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of seventeen hundred thousand men, should presume so far, upon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Archers on horse-back, as to think that he might doe what he list, yea that there was none other God than himself. It is indeed easie to find enough that might be said against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessitie of holding the book of Judith to be Canonicall, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some defence upon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it self. That Judith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmine (whose works I have not read, but find him cited by Torniellus) hath proved by many arguments. That she lived not in the Reign of Manasses, Torniellus hath proved very substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driven, as it were to break through a wall, in saying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time; that the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, chodonosor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meer fantasie, it is so plain that it needs no proof at all. Wherefore we may truly say, that they, which have contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stonie field) have chased Holofernes out of all parts of time, and left him and his great expedition, Extra anni solisque vias, in an age that never was, and in places that were never known.

Judit. 2. 23. & 25. Surely, to find out the borders of Japheth, which were towards the South, and over against Arabia; or the Countries of Phut and Lud, that lay in Holofernes his way; I think it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not busie my self herewith; having already so far digressed, in shewing who lived not with Manasses, that I think it high time to return unto mine own work, and rehearse what others I find, to have had their part, in the long time of his Reign.

§. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

THE first year of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one year the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabyne chosen, a peaceable man, and seeming very religious in his kind. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed only in Wars, to some good civilitie, and a more orderly fashion of life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition, as perswading them, that he had familiaritie with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonies which he delivered unto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these devices of Numa were, in his own judgement, no better than meer delusions, that served only as rudiments to bring the savage multitude of theeves and out-laws, gathered into one body by Romulus, to some form of milder discipline, than their boysterous and wild natures were otherwise apt to entertain. This appeared by the Books that were found in his grave, almost six hundred years after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himself was condemned as vain. His grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that belonged to one L. Petilius a Scribe. Two Coffins or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greek and Latine letters, which said, that Numa Pompilius, the son of Pompo, King of the Romans, lay there. In the one Coffin was nothing found; his body being utterly consumed. In the other were his Books, wrapped up in two bundles of wax; of his own constitutions seven, and other seven of Philosophie. They were not only uncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to have a sight of these Books, when he perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemn oath that they were against the Religion then in use. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to be openly burnt. It seems that Numa did mean to acquit himself unto wiser ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not been so foolish as to beleeve the Doctrine wherein he instructed his own barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith he had infected Rome, when he sate in his Throne, had not left working, when he ministred the Antidote out of his grave. Had these Books not come to light, untill the days of Tully and Cæsar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better discussed; likely it is that they had not only escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peradventure generall) effect. Being as it was, they served as a confutation, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was inveterate.

Numa reigned three and fortie years in continuall peace. After him Tullus Hostilius the third King was chosen, in the six and fourtieth of Manasses, and reigned two and thirtie years, busied, for the most part, in War. He quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field; but in regard of the danger, which both parts had cause to fear, that might grow unto them from the Thuscanes, caused them to bethink themselves of a course, whereby without effusion of so much bloud, as might make them too weak for a common enemie, it might be decided, who should command, and who obey.

There

There were in each Camp three Brethren, Twins, born at one birth (Dionysius sayes that they were Cousin Germans) of equall years and strength, who were appointed to fight for their severall Countries. The end was, that the Horatii, Champions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them first lost their lives. The three Curatii that fought for Alba (as Livie tels it) were all alive, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slain; but the third Horatius, pretending fear, did run away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equall speed, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning upon them, he slew them, as it had been in single fight, man after man, ere they could joyn together and set upon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling very particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatii was slain, then one of the Curatii, then a second Horatius, and lastly the two Curatii, whom the third Horatius did cunningly sever the one from the other, as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it self, wherein Rome was laid, as it were, in a wager, against Alba; and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained. For the Citie of Alba did immediatly become subject unto her own Colonie, and was shortly after, upon some treacherous dealing of their Governour, utterly razed, the people being removed unto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had been chief, became ere long dependent upon Rome, though not subject unto it, and divers pettie States adjacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were small, yet many, I will forbear to rehearse (as being the works of sundry ages, and few of them remarkeable considered apart by themselves) untill such time as this fourth Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to be the main subject of this History.

The seventh year of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manasses. Also the three last Governous for ten years, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find only names, Leocrates, Absander, and Erizias. After Erizias yearly Rulers were elected.

These Governours for ten years were also of the race of Medon and Codrus, but their time of rule was shortned, and from term of life reduced unto ten years; it being thought likely that they would govern the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow Dionysius of Halicarnassus, in applying their times unto those years of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronologicall Table, following this work, doth set them. For he not only professeth himself to have taken great care in ordering the reckoning of times; but hath noted always the years of the Greeks, how they did answer unto the things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Historie. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first year of the seventh Olympiad, and affirms, that the same was the first year of Charops government of Athens, I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanius, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner. Dion. Halic. l. 1. fol. 43. & 45.

In the reign of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets feigned to have had Asses eares, held the kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were devised of him; especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch might immediatly be changed into Gold: by which means he had like to have been starved (his meat and drink being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus delivered him from this miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himself in the River Pactolus, the stream whereof hath ever since, forsooth, abounded in that precious metall. Finally, it is said he dyed by drinking Buls bloud; being invaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (saith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) observed the Moons Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians having obtained some power by Sea, founded Naucratis a Citie on the East of Egypt. Psammiticus herein seems to have assisted them, who used all means of drawing the Greeks into Egypt, accounting them his surest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Egypt by force.

About

Plut. & Eusd. About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, founded Syracusa in Sicilie, a Citie in after times exceeding famous.

*Whence in Strabo there is sinus Astacenus a part of Pontus where this Citie standeth. The Citie of Nicodemia, sometime * Astacus, was enlarged and beautified in this age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus, according to Pausanias, lived much about this time.

Paus. l. 5. Hal. l. 3. Strab. l. 6. Justin. l. 3. Paus. l. 10. About these times also was Croton founded upon the Bay of Tarentum by Miscellus, the companion of Archias that built Syracusa. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient, and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age, and banished Lacedamon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie, where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Justine and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and about the same time, Manasse yet living, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicilie, Interamne in the Region of the Umbrii, now Urbin in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Asia, over against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses, who therefore were upbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long work to rehearse all that is said to have bin done in the five and fiftie years of Manasses: that which already hath been told is enough; the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, reserving only Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Of the times from the death of Manasses to the destruction of Jerusalem.

§. I.

Of Ammon and Josias.

2 Kin. 21. 2 Chron. 33. AMmon the son of Manasse, a man no lesse wicked than was his Father before his conversion, restored the exercise of all sorts of Idolatrie: for which God hardned the hearts of his own servants against him, who slew him after he had reigned two years. Phile, Eusebius, and Nicephorus give him ten years, following the Septuagint.

2 Kin. 22. 2 Chron. 34. Josias succeeded unto Ammon, being but a child of 8. years old, he began to seek after the God of David his Father; and in his twelfth year he purged Juda and Jerusalem from the high places, and the groves, and the carved and molten Images: and they brake down in his sight the Altars of Baalim: He caused all the Images, as well those which were graven, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graves that had erected them; and this he commanded to be done throughout all his dominions. He also slew those that sacrificed to the Sun and Moon, and caused the Chariots and horses of the Sun to be burnt. Of Josias it was prophesied in the time of Jeroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calf at Bethel, 1 Kin. 13. that a child should be born unto the house of David, Josias by name, and upon thee (said the Prophet, speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifise the Priests of the high places, that burn incense upon thee: a prophecie very remarkeable.

In the eighteenth year of his reign, he re-built and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Book of Moses, called Deutronomie, or, of the Law, which he sent to the King: which when he had caused to be read before him, and considered of the severe commandements therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that observe them, and the sorrow and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commanded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olda, 2 Chron. 34. 24 concerning the Book: who answered the messengers in these words: Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will bring evill upon this place, and upon the inhabitants thereof, even all the curses that are written in the Book which they have read before the King of Juda, because they have forsaken forſaken mee, and burnt incenſe to other gods. Only for the King himſelf, becauſe he was a lover of God and his Lawes, it was promiſed that this evill ſhould not fall on Juda and Jeruſalem in his dayes, but that he himſelf ſhould inherit his grave in peace. 2 Kin. 22. 15. 2 Chron. 34.

Joſias aſſembled the Elders, cauſed the Book to be read unto them, made a covenant with the Lord, and cauſed all that were found in Jeruſalem and Benjamin to doe the like, promiſing thereby to obſerve the Lawes and Commandements in the Book contained.

The execution done by Joſias upon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the falſe Prophets at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended unto thoſe Countries, that had been part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Yet I doe not think, that any victory of Joſias in war got poſſeſſion of theſe places; but rather that Ezechias, after the flight & death of Sennacherib, when Merodach oppoſed himſelf againſt Aſarhaddon, did uſe the advantage which the faction in the North preſented unto him, and laid hold upon ſo much of the Kingdome of Iſrael, as he was able to people. Otherwiſe alſo it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himſelf unable to deal with Pſammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raiſe the ſiege of Azotus, though the Town held out nine & twenty years) did give unto Manaſſes, together with his liberty, as much in Iſrael as himſelf could not eaſily defend. This was a good way to break the amity that the Kings of Juda had ſo long held with thoſe of Egypt, by caſting a bone between them, & withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territories with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeem the friendſhip of the Jewes, which had been loſt by injuries done, in ſeeking to bereave them of their own. When it is ſaid, that Manaſſes did after his deliverance from impriſonment, put Captaines of War in all the ſtrong Cities of Juda; it may be that ſome ſuch buſineſſe is intimated, as the taking poſſeſſion, and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifeſt that he took much paines, in making Jeruſalem it ſelf more defenſible; yet I ſhould rather beleeve, that he, having already compounded with the Babylonian, did fortifie himſelf againſt the Egyptians, whoſe ſide he had forſaken, than that he travelled in making ſuch proviſions only for his mindes ſake. 2 Chron. 33. 14

The earneſtneſſe of Joſias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the compoſition which Manaſſes had made with that King or his Anceſtor, was upon ſuch friendly termes, as required not onely a faithfull obſervation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perſwaſions could ſuffice to make Joſias ſit ſtill, and hold himſelf quiet in good neutrality, when Pharao Necho King of Egypt paſſed along by him, to war upon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

The laſt yeer of Joſias his reign it was, when as Necho the ſon of Pſammiticus, came with a powerfull Army towards the border of Judæa, determining to paſſe that way, being the neareſt toward Euphrates, either to ſtrengthen the paſſages of that River about Carchemiſh, or Cercuſium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this, Diocleſian is ſaid by Ammianus Marcellinus to have done,) or perhaps to invade Syria it ſelf. For it ſeemeth that the travail of Pſammiticus had not been idlely conſumed about that one Town of Azotus, but had put the Egyptians in poſſeſſion of no ſmall part of Syria, eſpecially in thoſe quarters that had formerly belonged unto the Adades Kings of Damaſco. 2 Chron. 35. 20

Neither was the induſtry of Necho leſſe than his Fathers had bin, in purſuing the war againſt Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly have availed the Egyptians, and advanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinary valour of the mercenary Greekes, that were far better Souldiers than Egypt of it ſelf could afford; & the danger wherein Aſſyria ſtood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more abſolute Princes, began to feel it ſelf better, and to ſhew what it could doe. Theſe were great helpes, but of ſhorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more convenient ſhall be noted. At the preſent it ſeems, that either ſome preparation of the Chaldæans to reconquer, did enforce, or ſome diſability of theirs to make reſiſtance, did invite the King of Egypt into the Countries bordering upon Euphrates; whither Pharao Necho aſcended with a mighty Army.

Theſe two great Monarchs, having their ſwords drawn, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, Joſias adviſed with himſelf to which of theſe he might adhere, having his Territory ſet in the mid-way between both, ſo as the one could not invade the other, but that they muſt of neceſſity tread upon the very face and body of his Country. Now though it were ſo that Necho himſelfe deſired, by his Embaſſadours, leave to passe along by Judæa, protesting that he directed himself against the Assyrians 2 Chron. 35. only, without all harmefull purpose against Josias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Israel would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein: as that of Hosea the last King of Israel, who when he fell from the dependance of the Assyrian, and wholly trusted to Sabacus or Sous King of Egypt, was utterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian so rooted up and tare in pieces, as it could never after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fel upon Juda in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Ezechia, whilest that good king and his people relied upon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proof, to shew the ill assurance that was in the help of the Egyptians, who (neer neighbors though they were) were alwaies unreadie, when the necessities of their friends required their assistance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seek to have the Jewes renew their ancient league with him, but only craved that they would be contented to sit still, and behold the pastime between him and the Assyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Armie as did, soon after this, out-face Nabulassar upon his own borders, left unto the Jewes, a lawfull excuse of fear, had they forborn to give it any check upon the way. Wherefore I beleeve that this religious and vertuous Prince Josias, was not stirred up only by politick respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himself bound in faith and honor, to doe his best in defence of the Babylonian Crown; whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by covenant made at the enlargement of Manasses, or by the gift of such part as he held in the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Juda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both unto the Babylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Egyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made their enemie.

Some think that this action of Josias was contrary to the advice of Jeremy the Prophet, which I doe not find in the Prophecie of Jeremie, nor can find reason to beleeve. Others hold opinion that he forgat to ask the counsell of God: and this is very likely; seeing he might beleeve that an enterprise grounded upon fidelitie and thankfulnes due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing unto the Lord. But the wickednes of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such root, as all the care of Josias in reforming the Land, could not pluck up) was questionlesse far from hearkening how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherin it was determined that their good king, whose life stood between them and their punishment, should now be taken from among them, and that in such sort, as his death should give an entrance to the miseries ensuing. So Josias levying all the strength he could make, neer unto Megiddo, in the half Tribe of Manasses, encountred Neco: and there he received the stroak of death, which lingring about him till he came to Jerusalem, brought him to the Sepulchres of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all Lam. 4. 20. the people and Princes of Juda, especially of Jeremie the Prophet, who inserted a sorrowfull remembrance thereof in his Book of Lamentations.

§. II.

Of Pharao Neco that fought with Josias: Of Jehoahaz and Jehojakim Kings of Israel.

OF these warres, and particularly of this victorie, Herodotus hath mention among the acts of Neco. He tels us of this King, that he went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe out of Nilus into the Red Sea. It should have reached above an hundred miles in length, and been wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middest of the work, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when half was done. There were consumed in this toylesome businesse twelve hundred thousand Egyptians; a losse great enough to make the King forsake his enterprise, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. Howsoever it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore he built a Fleet, and and levied a great Armie, wherewith he marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he used the service, as well of his Navie, as of his land-forces; but no particular exploits of his therein are found recorded, save only this victory against Josias, where Herodotus calls the place Magdolus, and the Jewes Syrians; which is a small error, seeing that Judea was a Province of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to have been the same place (though diversly named) in which this battell was fought. After this, Necus took the Citie of Cadytis, which was perhaps Charchemish, by Euphrates, and made himself Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Josephus witnesseth. Joseph. Ant. Jud. lib. 10. cap. 7.

Particularly we find, that the Phœnicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they surrounded all Africa, setting sail from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the coast, whereon they both landed, as need required, and sowed corn for their sustenance in that long voyage, which lasted three years. This was the first Navigation about Africa, wherein that great Cape, now called Of good hope, was discovered; which after was forgotten, until Vasco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrary course to that which the Phœnicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ran the way of the Sun, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the streights of Gibraltar, having Africk still on the right hand; but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not far from the same streights, leave Africk on the Larboord, and bend their course unto the East. That report of the Phœnicians, which Herodotus durst not believe, how the Sun in this journey was on their right hand, that is, on the North side of them, is a matter of necessary truth; and the observation then made hereof, makes me the better to believe, that such a voyage was indeed performed. Herod. l. 4.

But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let us tell what he did, in matters more importing his estate. The people of Juda, while the Egyptians were busie at Charchemish, had made Jehoahaz their King, in the room of his father Josias. The Prophet Jeremie calls this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short reign of Shallum King of the ten Tribes: for Shallum of Israel reigned but one moneth; Jehoahaz no more than three. He was not the eldest son of Josias: Wherefore it may seem that he was set up as the best affected unto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the Egyptian, as appears by the sequel. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affairs of Judea. This Countrie was now so far from making any resistance, that the King himself came from Riblah in the land of Hamath, where the matter went so ill on his side, that Neco did cast him into bonds, and carry him prisoner into Egypt, giving away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. The Citie of Riblah, in after times called Antiochia, was a place unhappy to the Kings and Princes of Juda, as may be observed in divers examples. Yet here Jehojakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gain, since he could no better use it. But how-ever Jehojakim thrived by the bargain, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken; which three moneths before was too stout to give him peace, when he desired it. Certain it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater task lying upon his hands, than would permit him to wast his forces upon Judea: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Charchemish, together with the dissention of the Princes Josias his sons (of whom the eldest is probably thought to have stormed at the preferment of his younger brother) gave him power to do even what should please himself. Yet he did forbear to make a conquest of the Land, perhaps upon the same reason, which had made him so earnest in seeking to hold peace with it. For the Jewes had suffered much in the Egyptians quarrell, and being left by these their friends, in time of need, unto all extremities, were driven of necessity to forsake that partie, and to joyn with the enamies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to recleaim them; seeing they were such a people as would not upon every occasion shift side, but endure more than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay upon them: so good a Patron did he mean to be unto them. Nevertheless, he laid upon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of silver, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reap at the present some fruit of his pains taken, and leave unto them some document in the future, of greater punishment than verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So he departed, carrying along with him into Egypt the unfortunate King Jehoahaz, who died in his Captivitie.

The reign of Jehoahaz was included in the end of his Fathers last year; otherwise it would hardly be found, that Jehojakim his successor did reign ten whole years; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that are current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short reign, into the first year of the brother, than into the fathers last, the same arguments that shall maintain his opinion, will also prove the matter to be unworthy of disputation; and so I leave it.

Jehojakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, having received his Crown at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall words, with reference to all the evill that their Fathers had done, makes it apparent, that the poyson wherewith Ahaz and Manasses had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Josias, but that it still cleaved unto the chief of the people, Yea, unto the Priests also; and therefore it was not strange, that the Kings had their parts therein. The Royall authoritie was much abased by the dangers wherein the Countrey stood, in this troublesome ahe: the Princes did in a manner what they listed; neither would the Kings forbear to professe, that they could deny them nothing. Yet the beginning of Jehojakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him insolent and cruell; as we find by that example of his dealing with Uria the Prophet: though herein also the Princes do appear to have been instigators. This holy man denounced Gods judgements against the Citie and Temple, in like sort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this, determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poor man fled into Egypt: but such regard was had unto Jehojakim, that Uria was delivered unto his Embassadour, and sent back to the death; contrary to the custome used, both in those dayes, and since among all civill Nations, of giving refuge unto strangers, that are not held guilty of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all privilege.

2 Chron. 36. 14.

It concerned Pharao to give all contentment possible to Jehojakim: for the Assyrian Lyon, that had not stirred in many years, began about these times to roar so loud upon the banks of Euphrates, that his voice was heard unto Nilus, threatning to make himself Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawn the house of Merodach from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Syria, require our consideration in this place, before we proceed to commit them together at Carchemish, where shortly after this the glory of Egypt is to fall.

§. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel couldnot give attendance on their businesse in Syria, which caused them to lose that Province.

Merodach the son of Baladan, who taking the advantage that Senacheribs misadventure and death, together with the dissention between his children, presented, made himself King of Babylon, was eleven years troubled with a powerfull Enemie, Asarhaddon the son of Senacherib, reigning over the Assyrians in Nineve; from whom whilest he could not any other way divert his cares, hee was fain to omit all businesse in Syria, and (as hath been formerly shewed) to make over unto Ezechia some part of the Kingdome of the ten Tribes. From this molestation, the death of Asarhaddon did not only set him free, but gave unto him some part of Assyria, if not (as is commonly, but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How greatly this was to the liking of the Assyrians, I will not here stand to enquire: his long reign following, and his little intermedling in matters of Syria, make it plain, that he had work enough at home, either in defending or establishing that which he had gotten. Josephus gives him the honour of having won Nineve it self, which we may believe; but surely he did not hold it long. For in the times soon following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yeelded upon some capitulation;

and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings, being of the Chaldean race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some think that this was the Assyrian King, whose Captains took Manasses prisoner, but I rather believe those that hold the contrary, for which I have given my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Jewes were his friends, and the Egyptians, that maligned the Northern Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was untill the time of Psammiticus, about the end of this Kings Reign, or the beginning of his son.

Ben Merodach the son and successour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures, yet is he named by good consent of Authors, and that speak little of his doings. The length of his Reign is gathered by inference to have been one and twenty years; for so much remaineth of the time that passed between the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephews Reigns (which is a known summe) deducting the years of his Father, and of his son Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner, and released him. Hee sped ill in Syria, where Psammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercenary Greeks, did much prevail. This may have been some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his hands some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alleged before.

Nabulassar that reigned in Babylon after his father Ben Merodach, had greater businesse in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to look abroad: insomuch as it may be thought to have been a great negligence or over-sight of Psammiticus and Necho, that they did not occupy some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes invaded Assyria, and besieged Nineve; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remove by the comming of the Scythians, who in these ages did over-flow those parts of the world, laying hold upon all that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is convenient that I speak in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, upon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering Assyria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a fair possibility of making himself Lord of Nineve.

That City (as Herodotus reports it) having been a Soveraign Lady, was not forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her self she was well enough. Herod. libr. 1.

This makes it plain, that howsoever Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall seat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Country; yet it found the means to set it self at liberty: as after this again it did, when it had been regained by Nabulassar his Grand-child.

Sharp warre, and the very novelty of sudden violence, use to dismay any State or Country, not inured to the like: but custome of danger hardeneth even those that are unwarlike. Nineve had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately reigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the fury, wherewith either Domesticall tumults between the sons of Senacherib, or forreign war of the Babylonians, could afflict it: and therefore it is the lesse wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed so ill in his journey against it. Hee and the most of his Armie perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps they undervalued their forces, and brought a lesse power than was needfull.) It is enough, that herein we may believe Herodotus.

Cyaxares the son of Phraortes, a braver man of war than his Father, wan as much of Asia the lesse, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; he sought revenge upon the Assyrians for the death of his father, and besieged Nineve it self, having a purpose to destroy it. I rather believe Eusebius, That he took the City, and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than Herodotus, That the Scythian Army came upon him whilest he lay before it. For where equall authorities are contradictory (as Eusebius, though far later than Herodotus, yet having seen other Authors that are now lost, it is to be valued according to his great reading) there do I hold it best, to yield unto the best likelihoods.

To think that the Scythians came upon Cyaxares, whilest he lay before Nineve, were to accuse him of greater improvidence than ought to be suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that he was fain to leave the Town, when a Warre so so dangerous fell upon his own Country, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldean and Assyrian affairs ensuing.

The destruction of this great City is both foretold in the Book of Tobit, and there set down as happening about these times; of which book whosoever was the Author, he was ancient enough to know the story of those ages, and hath committed no such errour in reckoning of times, as should cause us to distrust him in this. As for the Prophecie of Nahum, though it be not limited unto any certain term, yet it appears to have taken effect, in the finall destruction of Nineve by Nabuchodonosor, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a conquest of Egypt, foregoing this calamity, whereof we will speak in due place. Some that ascribe more authority than the reformed Churches yield, to the book of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessity, to affirm, that about these times, Nineve was taken; but they attribute (conjecturally) the victory over it to Ben Merodach: a needless conjecture, if the place of Eusebius be well considered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulassar the son of Ben Merodach did seize upon it, and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Country of Assyria was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Scythian Warre over-whelmed Media. For then was the Conquest wrought out ready to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Ninevites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon so much asswaged, that it might bee thought a great favour, if Nabulassar, appointing unto them a peculiar King, took him and them in protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this unthankfull People and their King rebelled again, as shall be shewed in the Reign of Nabuchodonosor.

§. IV.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twenty years.

†. I.

The time of his expedition.

NOw that I have shewed what impediment was given by the Assyrians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much disabled to performe any action of worth upon the Egyptians in Syria; it is time that I speak of that great Scythian expedition, which grievously afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adjacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble redounded even to the Egyptians themselves. Of the Scythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill known, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but ill agreeing with consent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them; for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by inference out of his relations, may seem very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise I should either seem to make my self too bold with an Authour, in citing him after a manner different from his own tale; or else to bee too forgetfull of my self, in bringing to act upon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twenty years, hee saith, that the Scythians reigned in Asia, before Cyaxares delivered the Countrey from them. Yet hee reports a warre between Cyaxares and Haliattes the Lydian, as foregoing the siege of Nineve; the siege of Nineve being ere the Scythians came. And further he tels, how the Scythians, having vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountred in Palestina by Psammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreaty procured them to depart from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, be true; though not in such order of time, as he hath marshalled them. For Psammiticus was dead before Cyaxares began to reign: and Cyaxares had spent half of his forty years, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia, so that hee could not, after those Lydian Warres, reign eight and twenty years together with the Scythians. It is true, that Eusebius doth also call Psammis the sonne of Pharao Neco, by the name of Psammiticus; and this King Psammis may, by some strained conjecture, be thought to have been he that met with the Scythians: for hee lived with

with both Cyaxares and Halyattes. But Eusebius himself referres all that businesse of the Scythian irruption into Palestina, to Psamminiticus the Father of Necho, whom he leaves dead before the Reign of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not rely upon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise than to believe him, that such things were in these ages, though not in such order as he sets them down.

It remains, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I find of this expedition scattered in divers places: a work necessary, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to be omitted in generall Historie; yet not easie, the consent of those that have written thereof, being nothing neer to uniformity.

I have noted before, that in the reign of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians overran that Kingdome, and were not expelled, untill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the upper hand of them. In these times therefore of Ardys, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twenty years, wherein the Scythians reigned over Asia. Now forasmuch as Psammiticus the Egyptian had some dealings with the Scythians, even in the height of their prosperity, wee must needs allow more than one or two of his last years unto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Reign in Lydia, being three and twenty years compleat after the death of Psammiticus, leaves the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Egyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficulty, the victorious Reign of Nabuchodonosor in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we think it possible, that hee should have adventured the strength of the Kingdome against the Egyptians and Jewes, had he stood in daily fear of losing his own, to a more mighty Nation, that lay upon his neck? To speak simply as it appears to me, the victories ascribed to Cyaxares and Halyattes over these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Army, but were the defeatures of some troopes that infested their severall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these Nabulassar, having the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardy Northern Laddes. Wherefore we may probably annex the eight and twenty years of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nabulassars Reign, in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of their oppressors.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Journey.

TOuching the expedition it self, Herodotus tells us, that the Cimmerians being driven out of their Country by the Scythians, invaded and wasted some part of Asia, and that the Scythians, not contented with having won the land of the Cimmerians, did follow them, I know not why, into far removed quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling upon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Scythians, as mischievous and foolish, or else Herodotus, and some other of his Country-men, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had been beaten, and Ionia, more than once, grievously ransackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their many Conquests so well testified in Histories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is insufficient to stain them with the note of Cowards. These were the posterity of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Western World, and whose re-flow did overwhelm no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof we do now entreat. He that would more largely informe himself of their originall and actions, may perule Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Book, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to have spoken of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, but hard to confute them: There we find it proved, by such arguments and authorities as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation, howsoever distinguished in name, by reason of their divers tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeed hath mention of the Cimmerians; whose Country whether he placeth in the West, as neer unto the Ocean and bounds of the Earth, or in the North, as being farre from the Sun, and covered with eternall darkneſſe; certain it is that he would have them neer neighbours to Hell: for hee had the ſame quarrell to them which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them ſeem a kind of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirms) to inſert into his works the names of ſuch as lived in his own time, making ſuch mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himſelf deſerved. And for this reaſon it is proved by Euſtathius, that the Cimmerians were ſo diſgraced by him, becauſe they had waſted his Country. Perhaps that invaſion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his diſcourſe with Helen, was the very ſame, which Euſebius noteth to have happened ſomewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together invaded Aſia.

This is certain, that both the Amazons and the Cimmerii (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often break into Greece and Aſia, which though it be not in expreſſe termes written, that they did with joynt-forces, yet ſeeing they invaded the ſelf-ſame places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One journey of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned alſo by Euſebius, was by the ſtreights of the Cimmerians, as we find in Diodore, who further telleth us, that the Scythians therein gave them aſſiſtance. The ſame Authour, before his entry into thoſe diſcourſes of the Amazons, which himſelf acknowledgeth to be fabulous, doth report them to have been wives of the Scythians, and no leſſe Warre-like than their Husbands, alleging the example of that Queen who is ſaid to have ſlain the great Perſian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carry their wives along with them to the warres; and how deſperate the courage was of thoſe Women, the terrible deſcent of them into Italy, when Marius the Roman overthrew them, gives proofe ſufficient. I will not here enter into a diſcourſe of the Amazons; another place will give me better leiſure to ſpeak of them: but ſeeing that they are noted by divers Hiſtorians to have belonged unto the Cimmerians, to the Scythians, and to the Sarmatians, we may therefore the better approve Goropius his concluſion, That theſe three Nations were one, or at leaſt that they were neer alies.

Diod. lib. 4. c. 2.

Diod. lib. 2. §. 11

Now as concerning the expulſion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appears to have been none other than the ſending a Colony of them forth into Aſia, with an Army of Scythians to help them, in purchaſing a new ſeat, and eſtabliſhing the Plantation.

The Sarmatians alſo were companions in this journey. For the City of Novograd in Ruſſia (which Country is the ſame that was called Sarmatia) ſtood in their way homewards, as ſhall anon bee further ſhewed. So that all the North was up in Armes: and therefore it is no marvell though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voyage was that, which the ſame people made five hundred years and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they iſſued from the parts about the Lake Maotis; they were then likewiſe aſſiſted (ſaith Plutarch in the moſt likely report of them) by the Scythians their neighbours; they had in their Armie above three hundred thouſand fighting men, beſides a huge multitude of women and children; they wandred over many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to have ſetled themſelves in Italy, they divided their Company, for the more eaſie paſſage thither, and were conſumed in three terrible battells by the Roman Conſuls. Meere neceſſity enforced theſe poor Nations to trouble the World, in following ſuch hard adventures. For their Countrey being more fruitfull of men than of ſuſtenance, and ſhut up on the North ſide with intollerable cold, which denied iſſue that way to their over-ſwelling multitudes; they were compelled to diſcharge upon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of poſſeſſion, as having title to all that they had power to get, becauſe they wanted all, that weaker, but more civill, people had. Their ſturdy bodies, patient of hunger, cold, and all hardneſſe, gave them great advantage over ſuch as were accuſtomed unto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thouſand ſuperfluities. Wherefore moſt commonly they prevailed very farre; their next neighbours giving them free paſſage, that they might the ſooner be rid of them; others giving them, beſides paſſage, victuals and guides to conduct them to more wealthy places; others hiring them to depart with great preſents; ſo as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the more effeminate people.

§. III.

of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

THe first Company of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand, leaving on the other side, & behind them, the great Mountains of Caucasus. These having passed through the Land of Colchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Country of Pontus, & being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontory, whereon Synope, a famous Haven Town of the Greeks, was after built. Here it seemes that they bestowed the weakest and most unserviceable of their traine, together with the heaviest part of their carriages, under some good guard; as drawing near to those Regions, in conquest wherof they were to trie the utmost hazzard. For in like sort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spak even now) dispose of their impediments, leaving them in a place of strength, where Antwerp now stands, when they drew neare unto Goule, upon which they determined to adventure themselves in the purchase. From Sinop, the way unto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ladg of Mountaines, or any deep Rivers at all to stay their march: for Iris and Halys the) had already passed. Herod. lib. 4.

What battels were fought between these invaders and the Lydians, & with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I find not written, nor am able to conjecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got possession of Sardis the capitall Citie of Lydia, only the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tells of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this invasion, and by Halyattes and Croesus in the times following, all that Ardys did against the Cimmerians, and all, save burning the Milesians Corn fields, that was done in twelve years by Sadyattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this businesse, that he could turn them to nothing elsl) is quite omitted: whereby it may seem, that neither of the two did any thing worthy of remembrance in those warrs, but were glad enough that they did lose all.

Certainly the miseries of war are never so bitter and many, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it forsaking their own seats, labour to root out the established possessours of another Land, making roome for themselves, their wives and children. They that fight for the mastery, are pacified with tribute, or with some other services and acknowledgements, which had they been yeelded at the first, all had been quiet, and no farther bloudshed. But in these migrations, the assailants bring so little with them, that they need all which the defendants have, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, even to the cradles of the sucking infants. The mercilesse termes of this controversie, arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or lose their lives without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe have felt examples thereof; and the mighty Empire of Rome was overthrown by such invasions. But our Isle of Britane can best witnesse the diversity of Conquests, having by the happy victory of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civill Arts, in exchang of liberty, that was but homely instructed therein before, whereas the issue of the Saxon and Danish Wars, was as were the causes, quite contrary. For these did not seeke after the Dominion only, but the entire possession of the Country, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible cruelty, eradicating all of the British Race, & defacing all memoriall of the auncient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are also of the Cimmerian bloud) found such end of their enterprize, as it may seeme that the Cimmerians in Lydia, & Scythians in the highest Asia, did arrive unto. So that by considering the proffe of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne, yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Many the Saxons won upon the Danes, yet not so great, as could drive them quite away, and back from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance even of utter enmity, had bred such acquaintance between them, as bowing the natures of both these people, made the one more pliant unto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced in one mild temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons in England, where great slaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their own Country wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it self of many thousands, that were sent to seek their graves abroad. And such (as I think) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victory of Halyattes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearisome length of time seems to have done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde hereunto my further conjecture, which is, that the matter was so compounded between the Cimmerians & Halyattes, that the River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Eastern side of the River was the Country of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians, and other Scythian people; whose wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have been.

And hereunto the quarrell ensuing between Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is said) fought in defence of certain Scythians, upon whom the Median sought revenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall slaughters, should have joyned in a league of mutuall defence for their common safety: though otherwise it had been dangerous to Halyattes, if hee had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, whatsoever the pretences might be, of taking revenge upon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the Warre between these two Kings, which Herodotus relates, I find it of little waight, and lesse probability. Hee tells of Scythians, that being chased out of their Country by faction, came unto Cyaxares, who commited unto them certaine Boyes, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feat of Archery. Now it so fell out (saith he) that these Scythians using much to hunt, & commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did nevertheless other-whiles misse of their game, and came home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward & cholerick, bitterly reviled them; & they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was under their charge, whom, dressing like Venison, they presented unto him; which done, they fledde unto Halyattes. This Herodotus delivers, as the ground of a war that lasted six yeeres between the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitives to be delivered into his hand, the other refusing to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians to betake themselves to either of these Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly, they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treachery that he shewed in the massacring of their Country men that were in his Kingdome, of whom it is now meet that we should speak.

Herod. lib. 1.

§. IV.

The Warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

AS the Cimmerians held their course westerly, along the shores of the Euxine sea, so the Scythians and Sarmatians took the other way, and having the Caspian sea on their left hand, passed between it and Caucasus, through Albania, Colchens, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Servan and Georgia, and so they entered into Media. The Medes encountred them in Armes, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was in the time of Phraortes, whilest Psammiticus reigned in Egypt. If it were in the sixt yeere of Nabuchassars Reign over Babylon (supposing him to have reigned five and thirty; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twenty yeares of their Dominion end, one year before the great Nabuchodonosor was King; so giving him good leave to provide securely for the invasion of Syria, which expedition hee began while his Father yet lived, as Josephus out of Berosus relates the History.

Now the Medes, desirous to save themselves as well as they might, from this terrible nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refused not to undergoe for the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, that would serve to remove these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Scythians finding still the Countries pleasanter & better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to be perswaded, that a little more travail would adde a great deal more to their content. For they relyed so much upon their own valour, that they feared no resistance; & being the bravest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not think: Babylon was near enough; whither if he could send these Locusts to graze, then should not his unfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabolassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I do not read. But it is well known that his Dominions lay in the middest between Media & Egypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributary; wherefore we may very well believe, that they watered their horses in his Rivers, and that he also was content to give them provender.

Psammiticus hearing of their progresse (like the jealous Husband of a fair Wife) took care that they might not look upon Egypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detain them there, than any force or perswasion that hee could use would send them going. Therefore hee met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow upon them, than on his Army that should keep them back. Egypt was rich; and half the riches had not been ill spent in saving all. Yet Psammiticus took the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had been so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For he lay close upon the edge of the Wilderneſse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palestine: whence he never advanced to meet with the Scythians, but gave them leave to feel as much of the scalding Sunne beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Syria could bear upon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next City to Gaza, then did he assay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work so much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heat of a Climate so farre different from their own. Psammiticus had at his back a vast wilderneſse, over the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrary distempers, could ill have endured to pursue him through unknown wayes, had they fought with him and prevailed, especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with relief, and them with new trouble at the end of their weary journey. Wherefore they were content to be intreated, & taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back to visit their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Egyptian King (besides that hee preserved his own Estate from a dangerous adventure, by hyring this great Army to depart from him) found all his Coast well repayed in the proceſse of his wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more than ever troubled themselves with the return of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resolving now to seek no further, began to demand more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grievous exactions, they presumed to live at discretion upon the Countrey, taking what they listed from the Owners, and many times (as it were to save the labour of taking often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long used over the higher Asia, that is, over the Country lying between the Caspian and Red Seas, and between India and Asia the lesse. Happy it was for the poor people, that in so large a space of ground, there was room enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamity that fell, as it were by chance, upon those private men, to whose wealth any Scythian did bear a fancy, would have lighted in generall upon all at one dip, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellowes. Yet it seemes that the heaviest burthen lay upon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrey, not farre from their own home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their insolent Rule was taken from them.

Cyaxares King of the Medes, who in this extremity was no better than a Rent-gatherer for the Scythians, perceiving that his Land lay unmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, resolved to prove what might be done by Herod. lib. 1.

stratagem. The manging of the businesse is thus delivered in brief; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Scythians, made them drunk, and slew them; recovering hereby the possession of all that they had lost.

Such another slaughter was committed upon the Danes in England; but it was revenged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelty than ever they had practised before. That the Scythians which escaped this bloudy feast, made any stirre in Media, I do not find; neither do I read that either in reveng hereof, or upon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by invasion from Scythia in time following.

This is the more strang, for that the Army returning home out of Medi, was very strong, & encountred with opposition (as Herodotus reports it) no lesse than it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the device of Cyaxares to free his Countrey, took good effect, with lesse bloud-shed than hath been supposed. For if he surprised all the chief of them, it was no hard matter to make a good composition. Many of them doubtlesse in eight and twenty years had so well setled themselves, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Country, many (of whom I shall speak anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to return home with what they had gotten; such as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe joyn with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other Provinces among their own Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are said to have bin with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be understood, that a great part of the Scythians, upon hope of gain, or desire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subject unto Nabuchadnezzar: mens love of their wealth being most effectuall, in taming the more unquiet love of inordinate liberty. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnezzar, as ever after, so in his first beginning of warre, did beat the Egyptians, who in ages forgoing had been accustomed to deal with the Babylonians after another fashion: & this new successe of that King may be imputed, in regard of human meanes, to such addition as this of new forces.

Jerem. 35. 9.

Of the Scythian Army returning out of Media, divers Authors report a Story, which confirmes me in the opinion, that this Company went forth to assist their kinred and friends, in acquiring a new seat, and establishing their plantation. For these had left their wives behind them, a good argument to prove that they meant to come again. The Scythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed-fellows to their slaves. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers-in-Law, & therefore prepared to fight with them at their return. If they were onely the children of slaves, which compounded an Army (as Herodotus would have it, who tels us, that the Scythians were wont to pull out all their bond-mens eyes) it must needes be that they were very boyes, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather beleeve that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Ancestors returning homewards, which I will set down, as I find it in Master Doctor Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Cõmon-wealth. They understood by the way, that their Clavlopey, or Bond-slaves, whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their townes, lands, houses, Wives, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed, and yet disdaining the Villany of their servants, they made the more speed home: and so not farre from Novogrod met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon advising what was best to be done, they agreed also to set upon them with no other shew of weapon but with their horse-whips (which as their manner is, every man rideth with) to put them in remembrance of their servile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, & lashing all together with their whips in their hands, they gave the onset: which seemed so terrible in the eares of their Villaines, & struck such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled altogether like Sheep before the Drovers. In memory of this victory, the Novogradians ever since have stamped their Coin (which they call a Dingot Novogradskoy, current through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the women of that Country have fared the worse ever since, in regard of the universall fault: For such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaves, curiously wrought by her self, is the first present that the Moscovian wife, even in time of vvooing, sends to him that shall be her husband, in token of subjection; being well assured to feel it often on her own loines. But this was a Document unto the Scythians, or rather Sarmatians (for Novogrod stands in the Country that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to set down of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appears to have been a great cause of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Judea, which continues yet a while the center of our discourse.

§. V.

Of Princes living in divers Countries, in these ages.

HAving thus far digressed from the matters of Juda, to avoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings, and men of mark, as were between the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Jerusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, untill the one and twentieth year of Josias; at which time Ancus Martius succeeding, reigned four and twenty years. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, prevailed so far, by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdom to himself, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, over whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth year of Zedekia, and reigned eight and thirty years. In this time it was, namely, in the second year of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedemonians bethinking them how to be avenged of the Arcadians, who gave succour to the Messenians against them in the former war, entred their Territory, took the City of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soon after beaten out. Cypselus expelling the race of the Bacidæ, made himself Lord of Corinth about these times, and governed it in peace thirty years; leaving for successour his sonne Periander, one of the seven Sages, but a cruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, slew his own wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, stripped all the Corinthian women stark naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive, that the wisedome of the Greeks was not excellent in those dayes, when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Country.

In these times also were Zaleucus and Draco, famous Lawgivers, the one among the Locrians in Italy, the other in the City of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were so rigorous, that he was said to have written them with bloud: for he rewarded every small offence with death. Wherefore his Constitutions were soon abrogated, and power given to Solon by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very mild. He forbad any Gentlewoman to walk abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unlesse it were when she was drunk; or to goe forth of the Town by night, unlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse her self up in immodest bravery, unlesse it were to inveigle a lover. By which pleasant Ordinances he effected his desire; for none would seem, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a singular example of justice, that when his own son had committed adultery, and was therefore to lose both his eyes, hee did not cause him to be pardoned, but gave one eye of his own to save the young man (who also lost one) from utter blindnesse.

I shall not henceforth need so farre to wander, as hitherto I often have done, in pursuing of actions collaterall to the History, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldæans will soon fall under the Persians; ere long, encounter with the Greekes; the Greeks, with the Romans; the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate, it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents, that befell them in their Minority. But in the long space of more than thirteen hundred years, which passed between the calling of Abraham, and the destruction of Jerusalem, wee find little matter, wherein the History of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neerest borderers. Yet read wee of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and thrown down; as likewise, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neer distance; all which must have been quite omitted, or elst reserved unto a very unseasonable rehearsall, had they not been disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniency, may pardon the necessity.

§. VI.

The oppression of Judæa, and destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldæans.

NOw to return to the Jewish Story, from whence we have so far digressed. In the third year of Jehojakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet living, entred Judæa with a great Army, who besieging and forcing Jerusalem, made Jehojakim his Vassall in despight of Necho, that had establisht him King, and took with him for pledges Daniel, being as yet a child, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also he took a part of the Church treasures; but stayed not to search them throughly; for Necho hasted to the succour of Jehojakim, hoping to find Nabuchodonosor in Judæa: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himself and his Army, it being a Country of an evill affection towards him, as also far off from any succour or sure place of retrait. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horsmen in his Army, it was the more wisely done of him, to fall back, out of the rough, mountainous, and over-hot Country, into places that were more even and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father happening at the same time, gave him just occasion to return home, and take possession of his own Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the second care, of adding more unto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Egyptian was not ready to follow him so far, and to bid him battell, untill the new year came in; which was the fourth of Jehojakim, the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the last of Necho. In this year the Babylonian lying upon the Bank Euphrates (his own Territory bounding it on the North side) attended the arrivall of Necho. There, after a resolved contention for victory, Necho was slain, and his Army remaining forced to save it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victory Nabuchodonosor so well pursued, as he recovered all Syria, and whatsoever the Egyptians held out of their proper Territory towards the North. The Egyptians being in this conflict beaten, & altogether for the present discouraged, Jehojakim held himself quiet, as being friend in heart unto the Egyptian, yet having made his peace with the Chaldæan the year before; who contented with such profit as he could then readily make, had forborn to lay any Tribute upon Juda. But this cool reservednesse of Jehojakim, was, on both sides, taken in ill part. The Egyptian King Psammis, who succeeded unto Necho, began to think upon restoring Jehoahaz, taken prisoner by his Father, and seeing him up as a Domesticall Enemy, against his ungratefull brother. Against all such accidents, the Judæan had prepared the usuall remedy practised by his forefathers: for he had made his own son Jechonia King with him long before, in the second year of his own Reign, when the Boy was but eight years old. As for this rumour of Jehoahaz his return, the Prophet Jeremy foretold, that it should prove idle, saying: Hee shall no return thither, but he shall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Egyptians indeed, having spent all their Mercenary forces, and received that heavy blow at Carchemish, had not remaining such proportion of sharp steel, as of fair gold, which without other help, is of little effect. The valour of Necho was not in Psammis Apries, who reigning after Psammis, did once adventure to shew his face in Syria, but after a big look, hee was glad to retire, without adventuring the hazard of a battell. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought onely with brave words, telling such frivolous tales, as men that mean to doe nothing, use, of their glorious acts fore-passed, against Iosias & Iehoahaz. In this case it was easie for Iehojakim to give them satisfaction, by letting them understand the sincerity of his affection towards them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonosor went to work more roundly. He sent a peremptory message to Iehojakim, willing him not to stand upon any nice points, but acknowledge himself a Subject, and pay him Tribute; adding hereunto such fearfull threats, as made the poor Judæan lay aside all thought of Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would have him. So hee continued in the the obedience of Nabuchodonosor three years. At this time Jeremy the Prophet cried out against the Jewes, putting them in mind that he had now three and twenty years exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their ears against him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captivity at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seventy years. The same calamity he threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumeans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drink out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of his fury, whom they had forsaken; and after the seventy years expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the same Cup, and be utterly subverted by the Medes, and the Judeans permitted to return again into their own Fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Jeremy seems to have been in the fourth year of this Jehoiakim, at which time Baruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom he sent to read them unto the People, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings fury, they had first set Jeremy at liberty, and advised him and Baruch to hide themselves. Jerem. 25.

Jehoiakim, after he heard a part of it, and perceived the ill newes therein delivered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Book in pieces and cast it into the fire. All which Jeremy caused to be new written with this addition; that the dead body of Jehoiakim should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost, and there should be none of his seed to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Jehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributary to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mighty City of Tyre opposed it self against the Chaldean forces, and upon just confidence of her own strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now forasmuch as the terme of seventy years was prescribed unto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ierusalem, and other towns and countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this City unto the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, have sure authority for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it followes of necessity, that the siege thereof began in the seventh of his Reign; as having lasted thirteen years.

Here I will take leave to intrude a brief note, concerning the severall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon hath risen much disputation. The third year of Jehoiakim, was the last of Nabulassar, who being delivered from other cares, took notice of such as had revolted from him unto Pharao Necho, and sent this Noble Prince his son, with an Army into Syria, to reclaim them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes mention of the same year. The year next following, being the fourth of Jehoiakim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Jeremy affirmeth in expresse words, and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth year he conquered Egypt; and then began to reign as a great Monarch, finding none that durst offend him. The second from this year it was, wherein hee saw that vision, of the Image consisting of sundry Metals; which did prefigurate the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the comming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but return unto the siege of Tyre, which began in the seventh of his Reign. Dan. 1. 1. Jerem. 25. 1.

The City of Tyre covered all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the main, by a deep and broad channell of the Sea. The Chaldeans had no Fleet, and were no Sea-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Sips, and skill to use them, excelled all other Nations; and every wind, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the City. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; wherefore nevertheless the judgements of God (denounced against it by Esay, Jeremy, Ezechiel) had threatned the destruction; and the obstinate resolution of Nabuchodonosor had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, undertook a vast piece of work, even to fill up the Sea that parted the Island from the Continent. The City of old Tyrus, that stood opposite to the new, upon the firm Land, and the mountain of Libanus neer adjoyning that was loaden with Cedars, and abundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteen years were spent in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seem strange: for Alexander working upon that foundation which was remaining of Nabuchodonosors Peere, and being Esay 22. Jerem. 25. Ezek. 26.

being withall assisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seven moneths ere he could make way into the City. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carry away that wherewith Alexander laboured to cover a shelfe, with much more violence could it overturn, and as it were consume, the work of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottom of the deep, striving as it were, to fill the empty belly of this Cormorant, whereas the Macedonian did only stop the throat of it. Every man knows, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his own threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to use either Miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earthquakes, and the like) by making at least the Seas calm, and adding the favourable concurrence of all second helps. But so it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to use the hand of man, even the hand of man striving, as may seem, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give over till he was master of the Town.

Ezek. 29.

When he was entred upon this desperate service, whether it were so, that some losse received, some mutiny in his Army, or (which is most likely, and so Josephus reports it) some glorious rumour of the Egyptians, gave courage to his evill willers, Jehojakim renounced his subjection, and began to hope for the contrary of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonosor gave him no leisure to do much hurt: but with part of his Army marched directly into Judea, where the amazed King made so little resistance (the Egyptians having left him, as it were, in a dream) that he entred Jerusalem, and layed hands on Jehojakim, whom he first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, he caused him to be slain in the place, and gave him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to be devoured by beasts and ravenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place Jehojakim or Jechonias his son; whom, after three moneths and ten dayes, Nabuchodonosor removed, and sent prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochæus and Josedech, the high Priest. The mother of Jechonias, together with his servants Eunuches, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carryed away Captives. This Jechonias, following the counsell of Jeremy the Prophet, made no resistance, but submitted himself to the Kings will: wherein he both pleased God, and did that which was best for himself, though at the present it might seem otherwise, to such as considered the evill that befell him, rather than the greater evill that he thereby avoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded, which was good. But it seems that he was partaker, at least of his Fathers faults, if not an instigator, which was the cause, that his submitting himself to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we read in generall words, that he did evill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonosor established Mathania his Uncle in the Kingdome of Juda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to say, as the justice of God. For like as Neco King of Egypt had formerly displaced Jehoahaz, after his Father Josias was slain, and set up Jehojakim the son of another mother; so Nabuchodonosor slew Jehojakim, who depended on the Egyptians, and carrying his son Jechonias Prisoner to Babel, gave the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Jehoahaz, whom Neco took with him into Egypt. From Zedechias he required an oath for his faithfull obedience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the living God to witnesse in the same, that he would remain assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

Joseph. Antiq. Jud. l. 10. c. 7.

In the first year of Zedechias, Jeremy saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one signifying those Judæans that were carried away captive, the other those that stayed and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Jeremy wrote in a book all the evill that should fall upon Babylon, which book or scrole he gave to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonosor; willing him first to read it to the Captive Jewes, and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these words: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rise from the evill that I will bring upon her. This journey of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have been in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further think, that he had some suit there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and sent him away discontented. For at his return all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seems) to those unquiet courses, from which Jeremy dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes, one of which he wore about his own neck, others he sent unto the five Kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre and Zidon by those Messengers which came to visit Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enjoy their own countries; if not, they should assuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

He also foretold them, that those Vessels which as yet remained in Jerusalem, should also travell after the rest, and at length they should be restored again.

The same year Ananias, the false Prophet, took off the woodden Chain which Jeremy wore in sign of the Captivity of the Jewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two years God would break the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layd on all Nations; restore Jechonias and all the Jewes, with the Vessels and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Jeremy, in stead of his woodden yoke, wore a Goller of yron: and in sign that Ananias had given a deceitfull and false hope to the people, he foretold the death of this cold Prophet, which seized upon him in the second Moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough between Faith and Passion, in the eighth year of his reign, hee practised more seriously against Nabuchodonosor, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promised great aydes of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian yoke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, he marched with his Army in the dead of Winter, toward Jerusalem, and besieged it. Jeremy perswaded Zedechias to render the City and himself: but being confident of the help from Egypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors and false Prophets, that it was impossible that the Kingdome of Juda should be extirpate, untill the comming of Silo (according to the Prophecy of Jacob) he despised the words of Jeremy, and imprisoned him. For Jeremy had told the King that the City should be taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but be taken prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabuchodonosor; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death. Gen. 49. 10. Jer. 32. & 34.

Jerusalem being the following year surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Egypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Jeremy, (Herodotus calleth him Apries) entred the border of Juda with his Army to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he had been the principall Author. But Jeremy gave the Jewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to have any trust in the succours of Egypt: for he assured them that they should return again, and in no sort relieve them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldaans removed from Jerusalem to encounter the Egyptians, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward, returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poor people of Jerusalem to their destined miseries. Jer. 44. Herod. lib. 2.

In the mean while the Jewes, who in their first extremity had manumised their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the year of Jubile) and made them free, thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now upon the breaking up of the Chaldean Army, repent them of their Charity: and thinking all had been at an end, held them perforce to their former slavery. But the Chaldees being returned to the siege, the Prophet Jeremy, when the State of Jerusalem began now to grow to extremity, counselled Zedechias to render himself unto them; assuring him of his own life, and the safety of the Citie, if he would so do. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and perjurie, had provided for him. Levit. 25. 39. 40. &c. Jer. 34. Jer. 39.

Three and twenty Moneths (as some do reckon it) or, according to Iosephus, eighteen, the Babylonian Army lay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged, For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) extruxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum: They surrounded the City with woodden Towers, so as the besieged could neither sally out, nor receive into the City any supply of men or victuals. Iosephus reports, that they over-topped the Walls with high Towers raised upon Mounts; from which they did so beat upon the Wall with their engines, that the defendants were compelled to forsake their Stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like unto these, yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions there-abouts, and had the Woods and Rivers Jer. 39. 2 King. 25. 1. Ios. Ant. Jud. lib. 10. cap. 11.

to obey him, found means to overthrow all the Citizens endeavours; and to beat down as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his own workes being guarded by the Walls of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within, layd open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both Famine and Pestilence (which commonly accompany men straightly besieged) grew on fast upon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the Iewes failed, the Chaldæans made a breach, and forcing an entry, their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Town, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this uncomfortable sight, and finding no remedy of the danger present, lost both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himself, together with his Wives, Children, Princes, and principall servants, out of the Citie, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed and guideless people, to the mercilesse swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Jeremy the Prophet perswaded him to render himself, despised both the counsell of God, and the force of Nabuchodonosor, used now that remedy, which Wolphius truly termeth, Triste, turpe, & infœlix: Wofull, shamefull, and unfortunate.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the help of the dark night) the Plains or Desarts of Jericho: but by reason of the train that followed him and his (every one leading with him those whom they held most dear unto them) he was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the company was that attended on him, yet, as Josephus reports it, they, on whose fidelity he most reposed himself, no sooner beheld the Chaldæans approach, but they all abandoned his defence, and shifted themselves into the Desarts, as they could. For whom God had forsaken, no man followed, but the ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children and Princes, he was conveyed to Rebla or Reblath, a City (as some think) of Nephtalim, where Nabuchodonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between Ierusalem and Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Ios. Ant. l. 10. c. 11.

Now after Nabuchodonosor had layd before Zedechias the many graces and benefits conferred upon him, together with the notable falshood and perjury, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes and Friends to be slain before his face. This being done, to the end that so lamentable a spectacle should be the last that ever he should behold in the World, he caused his eyes to be torn out of his head, and so carried him in a slavish manner to Babel, where he consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetuall imprisonment. Herein this most marvellous Prophecy of Ezechiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babyloniam, & ipsam non videbit: I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not see it.

Ezek. 12.

Thus in the eleventh and last year of Zedechias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonosor, the Chaldæans entred the City by force, where sparing no sex nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

3534. In the year next following, Nabuzaradan Generall of the Army, burnt the Kings Palace, and the rest of Ierusalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seventh to the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood four hundred thirty and one years.

After this, upon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with bloud) commanded seventy and two others to be slaughtered, which had hidden themselves from the first fury, to wit, the chief, and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedechias his men of Warre, five of his House-hold servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Judæa; and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the party of Nabuchodonosor, to till the ground: over whom he left Governour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Josias had formerly employed in the reformation of Religion, who is, for his justice and equity, by Josephus highly commended. This man, a Iew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the Warre: and by Ieremies desire to live with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same advice which the Prophet gave unto Zedechias; which was, to submit himself altogether to the Babylonian; who being ordained by God to exercise his justice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Ieremy being left to his own choice, either to live in Chaldæa, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not only embraced Ieremy, but gave comfort to all the other Iewes that were left under his charge, promising them favour & liberty so long as they remained obedient subjects to Nabuchodonosor, by whom he was established Provinciall Governour of his own Nation.

But ere that year was expired, a Prince of the late Kings house (who during the siege of Jerusalem, had kept himself out of the storm, with Baalis King of the Amonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Godoliah feasted them in Maspha or Mitspa, the City of his residence, trayterously slew him, together with divers Chaldeans and Jews that accompanied him. This done, he made an escape, and in his way encountering with eighty persons, repairing towards Godoliah with presents, he slew the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover unto him some Treasures hidden in the fields during the war. He also took with him a Daughter of Zedechias, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonosor. This practice and intent of Ismael had been formerly discovered unto Godoliah by Johanan, one of the Leaders of the few remaining Jewes; but Godoliah was incredulous.

Judea being now left without a Governour (for Ismael durst not take it upon him, but retired himself, or rather fled as fast as he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Jewes, fearing the revenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to fly away into Egypt, and besought Jeremy to ask counsell of God for them: who readily made them answer, that if they remained in Judea, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egypt, that they should then undoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this advice, the Jewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraining Jeremy and Baruch to accompany them, they travelled into Egypt, and inhabited by the permission of Pharao, neer unto Taphnes: where when Jeremy often reprehended them for their Idolatry, foretelling both the destruction of themselves, and the Egyptians, also, he was by these his own hard-hearted and ungratefull Country-men, stoned to death; and by the Egyptians, who greatly reverenced him, buried neer the Sepulchre of their own Kings.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

Intreating of the Times from the destruction of Jerusalem to the time of PHILIP of MACEDON.

THE THIRD BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing between the destruction of Jerusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

Of the connexion of sacred and prophane Historie.

THE course of Time, which in profane Histories might rather be discerned through the greatest part of his way hitherto passed, in some out-worn foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Eastern countries by the accompt from Nabonassar, left surer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, than were the War of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruin of Jerusalem to discover the connexion of antiquity fore-spent, with the story of succeeding ages. Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill be sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affairs of Kingdoms and Empire afterwards grown up, are not to be found among those that have now no state nor policy remaining of their own. Having therefore pursued the story of the World unto that age, from whence the memory of succeeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse derived unto us, I hold it now convenient briefly to shew by what means and circumstances the History of the Hebrews, which of all other is the most ancient, may be conjoyned with the following times, wherein that Image of sundry metals, discovered by God unto Nebuchadnezzar, did reign over the earth, when Israel was either none, or an unregarded Nation.

Herein I doe not hold it needfull to insist upon those authorities which give, as it were by heare-say, a certain year of some old Assyrian King unto some action or event, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all such computations were blotted out; the succession of Belochus and his issue that occupied the kingdom afterwards, depending upon the uncertain relations of such as were neither constant in assigning the years of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relye upon. Let it therefore suffice that the consent and harmony which some have found in the years of those over-worn Monarchs, doth preserve their names, which otherwise might have been forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, howsoever it be true that we find the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could we only learn in what age each of them lived, but not in what year his reign began or ended, were it not that the reign of Nebuchadnezzar is more precisely applyed to the times of Jehojakim and Zedechia. Hence have we the first light whereby to discover the means of connecting the sacred and prophane Histories. For under Nabuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captivity of Juda, which ended when 70. years were expired, and these 70. years took end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well known, affords us means of looking back into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first year of Cyrus his reign in Persia, by generall consent, is joyned with the first year of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he reigned three and twenty years before his Monarchy, and seven years afterwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversie. Giving therefore four hundred and eight years unto the distance between the fall of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiad by Iphitus; we may easily arrive unto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerly fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilst in sundry parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting down their times, which they had by Tradition from Authors of well-approved faith and industry.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned unto Alexander, and from him to the battell of Actium, it were (peradventure) in this place impertinent to set down. But seeing that the beginning and end of the Babylonian captivity are marks whereby we are chiefly directed, in passing from the first unto the latest years of the world through any story, with least interruption; it is very expedient that we take some pains to informe our selves truly of the 70. years during which it continued, even from Nabuchadnezzar unto Cyrus.

§. II.

A brief rehearsall of two opinions touching the beginning of the captivity: with an answer to the cavils of Porphyrie, inveighing against S. Matthew and Daniel, upon whom the later of these opinions is founded.

MAny Commentators, and other Historians and Chronologers find that the captivity then began when Jechonias was carried prisoner into Babylon, eleven years before the final destruction of Jerusalem under Zedechias. This they prove out of divers places in Ezechiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plain distinction between the beginning of the Captivity, and utter destruction of Jerusalem by Nabuzaradan, in these words; In the five and twentieth year of our being in Captivitie, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the Citie was smitten. In which words he beginneth the captivity in plain terms, eleven years before the City was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it began in the first of Nabuchodonosor, and the fourth of Joakim; which he endeavours to prove out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out of Saint Matthew, and Daniel, whose words afford matter of disputation, but serve not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole book of Daniel have ministred occasion of scossing and railing at the Christian Religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not understanding how the sons of King Josias were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath shewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken he knew not what in reckoning the sons, or, according to some Translations, the Sonne and Nephews of that good King, begotten about the time of the Captivity. Upon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious books written against the Christians, affirming, that these prophecies and visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or near the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond suppoſition of his, Euſebius, Apollonius, and others, have ſufficiently anſwered. For the ſeventy Interpreters, who converted the old Teſtament about an hundred years before Epiphanes, did alſo turn this book of Daniel out of Hebrew into Greek, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were ſufficient, who liued divers years before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Prieſt ſhewed that great Conquerour, when he came towards Ieruſalem to haue deſtroyed it, this book of Daniel, wherein he beheld his own glory foretold, as the ſame was plainly expounded unto him; which not only ſtayed his hand from the harme of that City and people, but his aſſurance and reſolution was ſo confirmed and ſtrengthened thereby, as deſpiſing all future perill and reſiſtance, he conquered Darius, and the Eaſtern Empire, in a ſhorter time than Nabuchodonoſor had done one City, to wit, Tyre in Phœnicia.

Mac. 1. 11.

Ioſ. ant. 11.

It is true indeed that the Iews themſelves give leſſe authority to Daniel, than to Moſes and the Prophets, accompting his book among thoſe which they call Cetaphim, or Hagiographa, or holy Writings, which they ſay Eſdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their return from Babylon. But firſt, that the book of Daniel (I mean ſo much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonicall: ſecondly, that it was written by Daniel himſelf, and not by Eſdras and the Seniors, we may aſſure our ſelves by teſtimony of Councels and Fathers. For in the Councell of Laodicea held about the year of our Lord 368. after the death of Iouinian the Emperour, and after the Nicene Councell three and forty years, this book of Daniel was received, verified and confirmed among the other Canonicall Scriptures, as in the Epitomy of the ſame Councell it may be ſeen; and ſo doth Meliton the moſt antient Biſhop of Sardis number it, witneſſe Euſebius in his Eccleſiaſticall Hiſtory, the fourth book, and five and twentieth chapter: ſo doth the ſame Author in the Catalogue of Canonicall books upon Origen: ſo doth Hilarius in his Preface upon the Pſalms, and Epiphanius in his book of Weights and Meaſures, &c. To theſe I may adde Saint Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographa books or holy Writings, the Iews and Rabbines reckon to be theſe; Daniel, Pſalms, Proverbs, Iob, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Eccleſiaſtes, Heſter, Eſra, Nehemia, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Eſdras, that wrote this book, Gods commandement unto him by his Angell, to ſeal up the ſame to the time appointed, is an unanſwerable teſtimony. Yea, that which exceedeth all ſtrength of other proof, our Saviour Chriſt, who citeth no Apocryphall Scripture, in Matthew and Mark allegeth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the laſt verſe of his ninth chapter. Further, in the fifth of Iohn, Chriſt diſtributeth the riſen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verſe the ſecond. Saint Paul deſcribeth Antichriſt out of Daniel, and the Revelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels viſions.

Dan. 12.

§. III.

That the 70. years of captivity are to be numbred from the deſtruction of Ieruſalem; not from the migration of Iechonia.

HAving thus far digreſſed in maintaining that authority which muſt often be cited in the preſent argument, it is now convenient, that we return unto the differences of opinion concerning the beginning of theſe 70. years. Neither will I ſtand to trouble my ſelf and others with laying open the grounds or weakneſſe of that which Euſebius and ſome few nameleſſe Authors have ſometimes held in this point, which is lately revived by Beroaldus; but will forth-with enter into conſideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have ſo earneſtly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Four Kings of Iuda were carried away captives to Babylon: Firſt, Manaſſes; then Iehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Feconias, and with him Ezechiel: laſtly, Zedechias, at which time the city & temple were deſtroyed. To the firſt of theſe captivities the beginning of the 70. years is referred by none that I have read; to the ſecond, by few, and with weak proof; to the third, by very many, and with much confidence. For beſides thoſe places of Ezechiel already cited, there is a ſtrong argument gathered gathered out of Jeremy, which may seem to make the matter plain. For the Prophet, in comforting the people that were carried away with Jechonias, useth these words: Thus saith the Lord, After 70. years be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and perform my good promise towards you, and cause you to return to this place. Jer. 29. 10.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seek the interpretation of a prophecy out of circumstances, when the prophecy is such as doth sufficiently expound it self. Jeremy hath already, in the fourth year of Jehojakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the sins and impenitency of that obstinate people, in these words: Behold, I will send and take to me all the families of the North, saith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar the King of Babel, my servant; and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an hissing, and a continuall desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voyce of mirth, and the voyce of gladnesse, the voyce of the Bridegroom, and the voyce of the Bride, the noyse of the mil-stones, and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Babel 70. years. And when 70 years are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Jer. 29. ver. 16, 17. & 18.

Here we see prescribed unto the captivity the terme of 70. years, which were to commence neither when the prophecy was uttered, nor when Jehojakim, who then reigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, nor yet in the time of Jechonia, but with the utter desolation of the City, whereof Jeremy did again give notice to those that were already in Babylon, at such time as he sent them the comfort of deliverance before rehearsed. And so did the people understand this prophecy, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. years at the time of the desolation, as manifestly appears in the end of the History of Juda, where it is said thus: They burnt the house of God, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vessels thereof to destroy all: And they that were left by the sword, carried he away to Babel, and they were servants to him and to his sons, untill the kingdome of the Persians had rule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of Jeremia, untill the Land had her fill of her Sabaths: for all the dayes that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. years. But in the first year of Cyrus King of Persia, when the word of the Lord spoken by the mouth of Jeremia, was finished) the Lord stirred up the spirit of Cyrus. 2 Chro. 36. 19.

We seldome find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainly expounded by another, as in this prophecy, to have afterwards been the subject of altercation. For one can hardly devise how either the desolation could have been expressed more sensibly, than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the prophecy have been more exactly set down, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it be requisite that we bring more proof in so evident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimony sufficient, unto this expedition of Jeremia his prophecy, that Jerusalem was to lye waste 70. years. For in the first year of Darius the Mede, which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God, the deliverance that had been promised, by prayer, which he made upon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth in these words: In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by books the number of the years whereof the Lord had spoken unto Jeremiah the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. years in the desolation of Jerusalem. So that howsoever the time of Daniel his own captivity be reckoned from the taking of Jehojakim, and that the people carryed away with Jeconia, did accompt, as well they might, the years of their own captivity; yet with the generall desolation of the Country, wherein were few or none of the Israelites left remaining to inhabite, began in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor the great captivity, which by Gods appointment continued unto the end of seventy years. Dan. 9. 2.

This I will not further seek to prove, by the authority of Josephus and others affirming the same, forasmuch as that which already hath been produced, is enough to satisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrary.

§. IV.

Sundry opinions of the Kings which reigned in Babylon during the 70. years.

WHat Kings reigned in Babylon, during these seventy years of the Captivity, and how long each of them did wear the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, forasmuch as neither their acts were notable in the age wherein they lived, nor the length of their reigns any way helpfull to the concordance of times, foregoing or succeeding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia (or rather some part of it) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may seem fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betook himself to ease, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdom, and for the honour of his Majesty, where it may seem that he and his Heirs kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behaviour of the Assyrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas under Nabuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofs) they attempted, and finished that hardy piece of work, of winning the strong City of Tyre, by joyning unto it the continent, filling up the deep and broad channell of the Sea, dividing it from the main with a mole or piece of earth, and other matter; the reparation whereof when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works: in the times following, they became timorous, that they durst not approach nearer to the enemy than their bows would carry, but were ready to turn their backs, as soon as any, though inferiour in numbers, adventuring within the distance, offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnezzars wars, till the ruin of their Empire, were not worthy to be recorded; so was the distinction of their times, and reign of their severall Kings, unworthy of the great labour that hath in vain been taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captivity of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. years, we may as reasonably forbear to search into the particular continuance of two or three slothfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriarchs, and their children living in the Egyptians servitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall assured sum.

Yet forasmuch as many have travelled in this businesse, upon desire (as I take it) to approve the beginning and end of the 70. years, not only by the reigns of other Princes, ruling elsewhere, but by the times of the Assyrians themselves; I will not refuse to take a little pains in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I think may best be held for likely, if the certain truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting down the years of their severall reigns. The first (as I take it) the surest, is theirs, who meerly follow the authority of the Scriptures, without borrowing any help from others. These name only three Kings, Nabuchadnezzar, Evilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other, to be their warrant, but the prophecy of Jeremy precisely, and in a manner purposely teaching the very same. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all according to his own will, and making it known that he had put some Countries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, saith thus: And all Nations shall serve him, and his Son, and his Sons Son, until the very time of his land come also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. These words, expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeed I find no other necessity of qualification to be used herein, than such as may grow out of mens desire to reconcile the Scriptures unto profane Authors. And this desire were not unjust, if the consent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single on the other side.

Jer. 27. 7.

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, & the proofs of their different reports are so slender & unsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus delivered in Scriptures, but only set down by some ſome Author of equall credit with the reſt, might very well have found and deſerved as good belief, as any of thoſe things which they have delivered in this point. For ſome there are, who following Joſephus, derive that Empire, as by deſcent, from father to ſon, through five generations; beginning with Nabuchodonoſor the great, and giving to him 43. years; to Evilmerodach 18. to Nigliſar the ſon of Evilmerodach. 40. to Laboſardach the ſon of Nigliſar 9. months, and laſtly, to Balthaſar (whom Joſephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchodonoſor, without naming his father) 17. years. And this opinion (ſave that he forbears to reckon the years, and plainly calls Balthaſar the ſon of Laboſardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alleging Beroſus and Joſephus as a ſectator of Beroſus, for his Authors; though Beroſus, as he is cited by Joſephus, report the matter far otherwiſe. For he tels us that Evilmerodach the ſon of Nabuchodonoſor did reign but two years, for his wickedneſſe and luſt, ſlain by his ſiſters husband Niziglisſoroor, who occupied the kingdome after him four years, and left it to his own ſon Laboſardach; who being an ill-conditioned boy, was at the end of nine months ſlain by ſuch as were about him, and the kingdome given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conſpirators, and left it unto Cyrus after 17. years. This relation ill agrees with that of Joſephus, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of years, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured unto them ſome authority, ſo that the names which they have inſerted, are taken as it were upon truſt. There is a third opinion which makes the three laſt Kings brethren and ſons of Evilmerodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture: though I had rather beleeve Xenophon, who ſaith that the laſt King of Babylon was immediate ſucceſſour to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholaſticall Hiſtory, who is founder of this opinion, placeth between him that took Jeruſalem, and Evilmerodach, another Nabuchodonoſor: plain enough it is that he hath, out of any Hiſtory ſacred or profane, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reaſon to follow him. Euſebius, Sulpitius, Severus and Theodoret, upon better ground have ſuppoſed, that Evilmerodach and Balthaſar were brethren and ſons of the great Nabuchodonoſor. This is built on the fifth Chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthaſar (for of Evilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is often called Nabuchodonoſor his ſon. And ſo common grew this explication, that S. Hierome called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of Jeremy before cited, proves that Balthaſar was not the ſon indeed, but the grand-child of that great Conqueror, though by the phraſe very common in Scriptures, and familiar in thoſe Eaſtern languages, he was called the ſon.

Joſ. l. 10. c. 12.

Xenoph. Cyropæd lib. 4.

Annius his Metaſthenes hits very rightly the ſeventy years of captivity, giving to Nabuchodonoſor 45. years, to Evilmerodach 30. years, and to the three ſons of Evilmerodach, Nephews of Nabuchodonoſor, fourteen years; that is, to Reg-Aſſar the eldeſt ſon, three years, to Lab-Aſſar Dach the ſecond ſon, ſix years, and to Balthaſar the third ſon, five.

To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole ſum of years, and in the number of generations, I have ſometime ſubſcribed, as not daring to reject an appearance of truth, upon no greater reaſon than becauſe the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not ſatisfie my ſelf herein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few ſuch of the modern Writers as deſerve to be regarded, have conſented with this Metaſthenes; and for that in making Balthaſar ſucceed unto his brother in the kingdom, and not unto his father, he is wholly againſt Xenophon, whoſe Hiſtory of the elder Cyrus in his Aſſyrian war I cannot ſlightly value in many reſpects, and eſpecially becauſe it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the King was at his drunken feaſt.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumſtances that might give any light in this obſcurity, I found manifeſt proof, that the time alloted unto Balthaſar by Annius his Metaſthenes, was far ſhort of the truth, which is enough to render all ſuſpected that he hath ſaid in diſtributing what part of the 70. years he pleaſed among the reſt. For in the third year of Balthaſar, Daniel ſaw a viſion, after which he was ſick certain days, but when he roſe up, he did the Kings buſineſſe: from which buſineſſe, that he did afterwards withdraw himſelf, and live retired, ſo long, that he was forgotten in the Court, it appears plainly, both by the many words which the old Queen uſed to ſet out his ſufficiency, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his preſence, whether he were

Dan. 5. 11, 12, 13. Dan. 2. 49. were Daniel. Now to think that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two years have been worn out of remembrance, were in my judgement a very strange conceit, which rather than I would entertain, I can well be contented to think the whole story (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Josephus, Berosus, and others, many new opinions are framed by conjectures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captivity being 70. years, and these years extending unto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nabuchadnezzar, his son and grand-child, must have reigned; it hath seemed needfull to supply the years of these three descents by inserting some, whose reigns might fill up the whole continuance of the captivity; with which the time allotted by Berosus and others, to Evilmerodach and Balthasar, joyned unto the years following the nineteen of Nabuchadnezzar, (wherein Jerusalem was laid desolate) are nothing even.

Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the years of Evilmerodach in this sort. They say, that the 18. years given to him by Josephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28. years, and the two years that Berosus hath allowed to Evilmerodach should be written 23. in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2.) and in the latter there should have bin added the figure of (3.) to that of (2.) this granted (to wit) that Evilmerodach reigned 28. years, whereof five together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonosor lived after the destruction of Jerusalem, make 48. then 4. years of Nigliſar according to Berosus, 9. moneths of Labassardach his son, and 17. years of Labonidus or Balthasar, make up the number of 70. years to the rise of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be utterly mistaken in all copies extant; upon how weak a foundation do they build, who having nothing to help them, save onely the bare names of two unknown Kings, found in authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had been entirely extant, were not worthy to have the place of Jeremy called into dispute, in regard of their authority.

§. V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, persons, and reigns of the Babylonian Kings.

OTher suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, I purposely forbear to rehearse, as falling under the same answer. That of Joseph Scaliger I may not forget, as deserving to be considered apart from the rest. Hee gives to Nabuchadnezzar 44. years, to Evilmerodach two, to Belsazer five: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was destroyed, unto the time of Cyrus, he accounteth only 59. years; beginning (as many do) the captivitie 11. years sooner from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath bin said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running between the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Caldæan Empire: wherein if he have erred, then is all further inquisition frivolous.

Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars reign, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliver my opinion. The time which he gives to Evilmerodach is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berosus than with the Scriptures. For we find in Jeremy, that this Evilmerodach in the first of his reign, shewing all favour to Jechonia, did, among other things, take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eat bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certain, all the dayes of his life untill he died. The very sound of these words (which is more to be esteemed than the authority of Berosus, were he perfectly extant) inports a farre longer time than two years, wherein Jechonia, under this gentle Prince, enjoyed the comfort sent by God, whose commandement he had obeyed in yeelding himself to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Jechonia did live, it cannot be proved; but plain it is hereby, that all his remaining dayes he did eat bread before this King. Now that he lived not so short a while after this as 2. years, it is more than likely; for he was but 55. years old when he was set at liberty, having bin 37. years in the prison, whereinto he was cast at the age of 18. years; after which time it seems plain that he begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to have been but but a young man, and one of Darius his Pages threescore years after this, as by other circumstances of his imprisonment it self.

Of Belsazer, to whom Scaliger gives the next five years, naming him also Laborosoardoch, I should wonder why he calls him Nebuchadnezzars daughters son, were it not that herein I find him very carefull to help out Berosus, by shifting in his Nirigliſſaroor, as husband to Nebuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his son four of these years; by which means there remains about one year to Belsazer alone, agreeing neerly with the nine moneths assigned by Berosus to the son of Nigliſar. But Jeremy hath told us that it was to Nebuchadnezzar, and to his son, and to his sons son (not to his daughters son) that the Empire was promised: which difficulty, if Scaliger could not help, it was well done of him to passe it over with silence.

Nabonidus the last of these, whom others (desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) have judged to be all one with Balthasar, is by Scaliger thought to be Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firm Berosian: for Berosus makes him of the same stock or race, a Babylonian. I speak not this to disgrace the travell of that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as affected with the love of truth) but to shew that he himself, having in some points disliked those Writers, whom in generall he approveth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no error. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whom Berosus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes: First, the phrase of Scripture, which signifies unto us, that Darius took the Kingdome, not saying that he wanne it by force of arms: Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, or of the Greek translation, which expressing no force of arms, doth only signifie that Darius took or received the Kingdome; I see no reason why we should thereupon infer, that the next king entred by Election; seeing Daniel relateth not the means and circumstances of Balthasars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his own prophecy. Neither could it indeed have properly been said (if Daniel had cared to use the most expressive termes) that Darius of the Medes, breaking into the City, did win the Kingdome; seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his use. Now concerning the fragment of Megasthenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his works printed at Basile, in the year 1559. I find onely thus much of Megasthenes, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchodonosor was more valiant than Hercules; that he subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Asia, as far as to the Armenians; and that, as the Chaldæans report, being returned into his Kingdome, and rapt with a divine fury, he cryed with a loud voyce: O Babylonians, I foretell ye of a great calamity that shall come upon you, which neither Bel, nor any of the gods shall avert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asse, that shall bring slavery upon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I believe little or nothing, saving that Nabuchodonosor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold, from the golden head, to the silver breast. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I doe hold it neither true nor probable.

If Scaligers copy of Eusebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells us that Nabuchodonosor wanne both Africk and Spain, I believe the fragment so much the lesse; and am as little moved with the authority of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Assyrians; as where it tels of Nebuchadnezzar his own vanishing away. Indeed that same title of half an Asse, by which he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable, as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers side than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Asses upon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnity and coherence which it had within it self, I easily allow it. But this proves nothing; for meere fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man believe that one so judicious, industrious, and deeply learned as Joseph Scaliger, would overshoot himself, in setting down repugnancies.

It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from which there is no appeal. And herein it seems that Scaliger, well knowing his own sufficiency, hath been little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecy of Daniel were true, that the Kingdome of Balthasar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians, either we must think that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else we must bethink our selves what Persian it might be that shared the Kingdome with him. For it is not more certain that Balthasar lost his life and Kingdome, than that his Kingdome was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to have been Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that Empire, and were accounted as Lords over all the subject Provinces, insomuch that the Greek Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made upon Greece, The Warres of the Medes. Yea, to Dan. 8. 20. clear this point, even Daniel himself resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, unto a Ramme with two horns, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Joseph Scaliger, for maintaining upon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes was partner with Cyrus, in his victories, and not a Chaldaan King by him subdued. Neither was Iosephus to be the lesse regarded, for affirming that Balthasar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his Nephew Cyrus, though herein he varied from Berosus and others, whose authority elsewhere he gladly citeth. For Josephus had no reason to believe any mans faith or knowledge of those times half so well as Daniels, whom I believe that he understood as farre as was needfull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to allege all Authors that had any mention, though unperfect, of the same things that were contained in the writings of the Jewes, to whose Histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might seem fabulous. Even so doe Eusebius and other Writers willingly embrace the testimonies of Heathen books making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tryed in generall by the self-same Ethnick Philosophers, but leave them where they are against the truth; as Josephus in this case hath left Berosus. And thus much I thought it meet to say of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding nevertheless in due regard his learning and judgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had then been very great.

§. VI.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of Nabuchodonosor his successors.

IT now remains that I freely acknowledge mine own weaknesse, who cannot find how the 70. years of captivity are to be divided among them which reigned in Babylon, though I find that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truly say with Pererius, that we ought liberally to pardon those whose feet have failed them in the slippery waies of Chronology, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulnesse, or heedlesse reckoning. Yet will I adventure to deliver my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding those only to have reigned over the Chaldaans, whose names are found in the Scriptures) appears more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Conjectures before rehearsed. Not that I will take upon me to defend Lyra his Conjectures, when he supposeth by Niglisar and Labosardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scriptures Evilmerodach and Balthasar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but only to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seventy years. First therefore let us consider the reign of Nabuchadnezzar, in whose eighteenth year Jerusalem was taken and sackt, but in his nineteenth laid utterly desolate.

Most of Writers have given to him 43. years of reign, following therein Berosus. There are who have added one year more; and some have made it up 45. To dispute about the certainty were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certain truth.

Manifest

Manifeſt it is, that the 19. year of Nebuchadnezzar, is joyned with the 11. of Zedechias, as alſo that his eighth year, was the firſt year of Jechonia his captivity; the reign of Zedekias occupied all the mean ſpace, being of 11. years. This is generally agreed upon, ſo that it needs no further prooфes: As for the beginning of his ſucceſſor Evilmerodach, it was in the ſeven and thirtieth year of Jechonia his captivity; ſo that Nebuchadnezzar after his 8. year (which was the firſt of Jechonias his bondage) reigned 35. whole years, and peradventure a good part of the ſix and thirtieth, forasmuch as Jechonia was inlarged with ſo great favour, not untill the end of the year. Subſtracting therefore out of theſe four and forty, which Nebuchadnezzars reign did well-neer occupie, thoſe eighteen years of his which paſſed away before the captivity of Juda, and ruin of the City, we have remaining ſix and twenty years of the ſeventy, that were almoſt wholly ſpent when his ſon began to reign. 2 King 2. 5 8. & Jerem. 51. 1. 2 King 24. 12. 2 King 25. 27. & Jerem. 52. 31

It is now to be conſidered how the remainder of the ſeventie years were divided between the Kings ruling in Babylon untill the firſt of Cyrus. A queſtion more difficult (as I ſaid before) than greatly needfull: the whole ſum being certain, and the diſtinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were ſlothfull Princes. Neither can any man the more juſtly ſuſpect the beginning or end of the whole 70. years, for that the diſtribution of ſome part of them is only conjecturall; ſeeing that none who gives any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refuſed to follow both unlikely and deſperate conjectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others have done; knowing well before-hand, that whoſoever ſhall diſcover my error, muſt do me the pleaſure (which I could rather wiſh in a caſe more materiall) of making me to underſtand the truth.

Of the four and forty years remaining in accompt of Nebuchadnezzars death, wee are to take away the laſt, which was the firſt of Darius the Mede, & then having authority good enough to warrant us from blame of preſumption, in giving us ſeventeen years to Balthaſar, we find left in our hands to beſtow upon Evilmerodach ſix & twenty years. Of the year belonging unto Darius the Mede, I have already ſpoken what I thought ſufficient, in delivering my opinion of the beginning and continuance of this captivity. That Balthaſar did reign ſeventeen years, we have the authority of Joſephus, before cited in expreſſe words; Wee have alſo the generall conſent of all, or the moſt late Writers, interpreting Beroſus his Nabonidus, who reigned ſo long; & Balthaſar to have been one. But nothing moveth me ſo much to beleeve this Tradition, as firſt thoſe evident places in Daniel, ſhewing that in the third year of Balthaſar hee followed the Kings buſineſſe, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his reign, (a proof ſufficient of no few years, paſſing under this man, eſpecially ſeeing it is no where found that Daniels employments took end either that year or the next.) Secondly, the conſideration of Cyrus his warres againſt the Aſſyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, & being alwaies proſperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time; though wee make large allowance to his deeds in the lower Aſia, which fell out in the middeway. I have already ſhewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the reign of Evilmerodach was not ſhort, and that men of great judgment have found it moſt probable, that he was a King three and twenty years. More, I think, they would have allowed him, had not the deſire of ſatisfying Beroſus cauſed them to reſt content with this. And ſurely it were greatly to bee wiſhed, that books of ſuch antiquitie, as thoſe of Beroſus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many dark paſſages of Antiquitie. I will yet confeſſe, that were his works never ſo excellent, and in all things elſe unqueſtionably true, I would not therefore condeſcend unto him in ſome one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemie: How much leſſe ought I obey a broken fragment of his, containing onely ſeven or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they beleeve that follow him in the reſt? The Scriptures have told us that God gave the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his ſonne, and to his ſonnes ſonne: How long each of them held it, wee find not expreſſed; yet would we gladly know it of Beroſus, or of any other that would teach us; provided alwayes, that helping us in a particularity, hee deſtroyed not thereby the generall truth. More words are needleſſe. It is enough to ſay with others, that Beroſus, or Joſephus who cited him, hath been wronged by the carelineſſe of Scribes; and that it was as eaſie for thoſe Scribes to erre in writing two Dan. 8. 1. & 27. & cap. 5. v. 11. 12. & 13. Jerem. 27. 7.

for six and twenty, as for three & twenty, or perhaps more easie. For, the omission of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. signifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of 8 that stands for 8. than hath 3 which is used for 3. So that the numerall notes 85. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might bee altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mischance not unusuall, had omitted the first strok of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seem not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could bee supposed in 85 standing for 23. I doe not well perceive. As for the Arithmeticall figures now in use, they were long after the time of Josephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertain unto this businesse; unlesse wee should ghesse that his works were corrupted in that unlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanity, but in a sort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berosus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the favour of his authority, by forsaking Jeremy and Daniel when they seem to be his opposites.

Of the victories which Nabuchodonosor obtained between the destruction of Jerusalem and conquest of Egypt.

WIth what actions this time of 70. years was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peradventure have been some cause that the time it self was, and is yet sought to bee abridged, as not having left sufficient matter to witnesse the length of it. But by such an argument we might as well deny to many people even their being. For every Nation (I know not whom I should except) between the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothfull age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no marvell, if the posterity of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things ready to their hand, which their hearts could have desired, betook themselves to their ease and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sons of greedy fathers, their own wisedome greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their days in the restlesse travell of purchasing: Though indeed the reign of Nabuchodonosor was so divided, that his youthfull and stronger years having been exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in establishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours past. The nineteenth year of his reign it was, when destroying utterly the great and mighty Citie of Jerusalem, hee enriched himself with abundance of spoil, and terrified all that would offer to resist him, by that fearfull example. From that time forward, he, untill his three and twentieth year, laboured in the conquest of those adjoyning Regions, which God had exposed unto his sword, and commanded to wear his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sydonians, and Egyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and served under him, when Jerusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citie was founded on an Island, safe enough from any danger of a Land-army, & whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to fear any enemy at sea, were neither daunted with the fall of their neighbour cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mighty Prince, imploying all his power to their subversion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Jerusalem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might bee in the same quarrell against the common enemie) it appeares by the words which Ezekiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; Aha, the gate of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing she is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at length, even in the nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, that great work of his, whereof we have already spoken, began to appear above the waters, and threaten them with inevitable mischief.

But those prophecies of Jeremy & of Esay, which appoint unto this desolation of Tyre the same terme of 70. years, that was prescribed unto the reign of the Chaldeans, doe plainly plainly shew, that she followed Jerusalem, the same nineteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner utterly lost. This much we find, That the Citizens perceiving the Town unable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus. Nevertheless it seems that this evasion served only the principall men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer sort unto the enemies fury. For, not onely such people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent, (who are Called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus Nabuchodonosor caused his Armie to serve a great service against Tyrus, wherein every head was made bald, and every shoulder was made bare, yet had hee no wages, nor his Armie; but was fain to rest contented with the Honour of having destroyed that Citie, which in all mens judgements had been held invincible. Ezech. 29.18.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, having made the name of the Chaldeans dreadfull in the ears of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodonosor used the advantage of that reputation which he had obtained by victories already gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with lesse pain. The Kingdome of Egypt was the mark at which he aimed, a Country so abounding in all riches and pleasures, that it might well have tempted any Prince, finding himself strong enough, to seek occasion of quarrell against it, and so farre an enemy to the Crown of Babylon, that had it been poorer, yet either it must have been subdued, or the conquest of Syria could ill have been established. Nevertheless it was needfull, that before he entred into this businesse, the Countries adjacent should bee reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his devotion, or at least be unable to work him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For, the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adjoyning Regions, whom God for their sins had condemned to fall under the Babylonian swords, were such, as regarding only their own gain, had some of them, like Ravens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feed upon the carcasses that fell by the cruelty thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Countries which were by his victories belonging to Nabuchodonosor: all of them thinking, that when the Assyrian had satisfied his fury, he should be fain to forsake those desolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand upon it. Particularly the Edomites and Philistims had shewed much malice to the Jewes when their City was taken. What good service they had done to the Chaldeans, I find not; if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own purposes, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to rejoyce at the fall of Jerusalem, but presently they entered upon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceive what other ground that practice had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he sent Ismael, a Prince of the bloud of Juda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Governour over those that remained in Israel, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Countrey the people that abode in Mizpah, than a desire of embroyling Nabuchodonosor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his own Countrey, and abandon those wasted Lands to himself and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policy the Moabites did exercise; whose pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their dissimulation condemned, as not doing right. Ezech. 25.12. & 15. Ezech. 25.3. Jerem. 49.1. Jerem. 40.14. & 41.2. & 10. Jer. 28.27, &c.

All these nations had the art of ravening, which is familiar to such as live or border upon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the uttermost cunning of their theevish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their devices by sharp and sudden warre, over-whelming them with unexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, who foretold, with little difference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the miserie that should come upon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seems that Moab was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of Esay, threatning Moab with destruction after three years, as having reference to the third year following the ruine of Jerusalem; the next year after it being spent in the Egyptian Esay 16.14.

expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall towns in these Regions were burnt, and the people slain, or made slaves, few excepted, who being preserved by flight, had not the courage to return to their habitations over hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but lived as miserable out-lawes, or at least oppressed wretches, untill the end of the seventy years, which God had prescribed unto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Juda.

§. VIII.

That Egypt was conquered, and the King therein reigning slain by Nabuchodonosor, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who, following Herodotus and Diodorus, relate it otherwise.

WHen by a long course of victory Nabuchodonosor had brought into subjection all the Nations of Syria, and the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemy to himself, nor friend to the Egyptian, was left at his back, that might give impediment unto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did he forth-with take in hand the conquest of Egypt himself, upon which those other Nations had formerly bin depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious issue thereof, the three great Prophets, Esay, Jeremy, and Ezekiel, have written so plainly, that I hold it altogether needlesse to look after more authoritie, or to cite for proof halfe of that which may be alleged out of these. Nevertheless, wee find many and good Authors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to strain these Prophecies with unreasonable diligence unto such a sense, as gives to Nabuchodonosor little more than the honour of having done some spoile in Egypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affairs. So preposterous is the delight which many men take in the means and second helps conducing to their purpose, that oftentimes they doe preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to uphold a sentence, giving testimony to one clause, doe carelessly overthrow the history it self, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of Egypt, which reigned about these times, are already rehearsed in the former book: but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved unto this place. Herodotus doth affirm that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; (unlesse we should understand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to have made upon Tyrus and Sydon) that he reigned five and twenty years, and was finally taken and put to death by his own Subjects; who did set up Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Egyptians hee imputeth to a great losse which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole army was destroyed. This calamity the people of Egypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater securitie reign over such as staied at home. So they who escaped, and the friends of such as were slain, rebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appease the tumult; but Amasis became Captain of the rebells, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land consented unto this new Election; whereby Apries was driven to trust unto his forraign Mercenaries, the Ionians and Carians, of whom he kept continually in readinesse thirty thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were at length vanquished by the great number of the Egyptian forces, amounting unto two hundred and fifty thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of Warre. Apries himself being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, untill the Egyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extreme enemie to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and strangled him, yet they gave him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whom Diodorus Siculus doth neerly agree, telling us that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phœnicians in battell at Sea, took by force and demolished Sidon, wanne the other Towns of Phœnicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally perished, as is before rehearsed, when hee had had reigned two and twenty years. This authority were enough (yet not more than enough) to inform us of Apries his history, if greater authority did not contradict it. But the destruction of Egypt by the Babylonian, foretold by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compell our belief, than have the traditions of Egyptian Priests (which the Greek Historians followed) and greater probabilities to perswade those that look only into humane reasons. For Esay prophecied long before of the shamefull captivity of the Egyptians, whom the King of Ashur should carry away naked, young and old, in such wise, that the Jews, who fled unto them for deliverance from the Assyrian, should be ashamed of their own vain confidence in men so unable to defend themselves. Esa. 20. v. 4. & 6.

But Ezekiel and Jeremy, as their prophecies were neerer to the time of execution, so they handled this argument more precisely. For Ezechiel telleth plainly, that Egypt should be given to Nabuchadnezzar, as wages for the service which he had done at Tyre: Also he recounteth particularly all the chief Cities in Egypt, saying, That these by name should be destroyed, and go into captivity, yea that Pharao and all his Army should be slain by the sword. Wherefore it must needs be a violent exposition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an insurrection and rebellion concludes all, without any other alteration in Egypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed unto Apries, by force indeed, but by the uniforme consent of all the people. Certainly, if that notable place of Jeremy, wherein he foretelleth how the Jews in Egypt should see Pharao Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had been, were to be referred unto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath over-ruled it; then was it vainly done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should think, seeing he did it by the appointment of God himself) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, those very stones, upon which the Throne of Nabuchodonosor should be set, and his Pavilion spred. Yea then was that prophecy no other than false, which expressed the end of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visit the common people of No, & Pharaoh, and Egypt, with their gods and their Kings, even Pharaoh, and all that trust in him: and I will deliver them into the hands of those that seek their lives, and into the hand of Nabuchadnezzar, King of Babel, and into the hands of his servants. The clearnesse of this prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greek Historians. Wherefore looking upon Junius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharao Hophra to be Amasis and his followers, I found him here acknowledging that the Egyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus with lies, coyned upon a vain-glorious purpose of hiding their own disgrace and bondage. And surely it may well be thought, that the history of Nabuchadnezzar was better known to the Jews, whom it concerned, than to the Greeks; that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather beleeve Josephus, reporting that Nabuchodonosor in the three and twentieth year of his reign, and the fifth year of the destruction of Jerusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his stead, than Herodotus or Diodore; who beeing meer strangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labour in searching out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting aside all advantage of authority, we should only consider the relations of Josephus, and of the Greek Historians, as either of them might be verified of it self by apparent circumstances, without reflecting upon the Hebrew Prophets, or Egyptian Priests; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be approved, as having been wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspition, yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodotus and Diodore. For the great love & honor which the Egyptians did bear unto their Kings, is notorious by the uniform testimony of all others that have handled the matters of that Country, as well as by the report of Diodore himself. How then can we think it probable, that Apries having won great victories, did for one only losse fall into the hatred of all his people? or which may serve to perswade us, that a King of Egypt would seek, or so demean himself, that he might be thought to seek the destruction of his naturall subjects? As for that Army of thirty thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Egypt, whom Amasis took prisoner, is said to have kept for his defence: doth it not argue that he was a forrainer, and one that armed himself against the Egyptians, wishing them few and weak; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as assuredly their own, as the strength of their own bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull, to use all Arguments that might be alleged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was some forrain Governour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would have desired to save his life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disprove that opinion, whereunto I should not have yeelded, though it had stood upon great appearance of truth, considering that the voice of truth it self cries out against it, but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Egypt by Nabuchodonosor, to be observed where due occasion in course of the story following shall present them.

How Egypt was subdued and held by Nabuchadnezzar.

IT is a great losse, that the generall History of the World hath suffered, by the spoil and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments that should have preserved the memory of such famous actions as were accomplished by this mighty Prince Nabuchodonosor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now uncertain. That his Victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Provinces, were such as did more enlarge his Dominion, than all the former Wars had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezekiel, who reckoneth up in his thirtieth Chapter (besides the whole Country of Egypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations, that may seem to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these Wars are in a manner utterly lost; but that the victory was easie and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I think worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Book) thought himself most safe in Egypt by the well defenced situation of his Country, did very unwisely in suffering his enemies to sweep the way clean unto his own doors, by consuming all his friends and adherents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden than weary the Chaldean Army, so the confidence and vain security of the Egyptians, relying upon the difficult passages which the enemy was to make thorow the Arabian deserts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would afford unto themselves, did little avail them in provision for the war, and much astonish them (as may justly be thought) in the time of execution: it being usually seen, that the hearts of men fail, when those helps fail, in which they had reposed more confidence than in their own vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Egypt had flourished under the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred and fourscore years; but from this time forward it remained forty years without a King, under the subjection of the Babylonians, and then at length it began to recover by little and little the former greatnesse, yet so, that it was never dreadfull unto others, God having said of that people, I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule the Nations. For whereas it hath been said of Pharaoh: I am the son of the wise, I am the son of the ancient Kings: and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Egypt now became fools, the river failed them, the King himself was taken and slain, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first year after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, at which time (saith Josephus) He slew the King then reigning, placed another in his room, and carried captives thence to Babylon the Jews whom he found in that Country. Now concerning the time which Josephus gives unto this businesse, and the businesse it self, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which insinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Jerusalem, and carrying away those unto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruins of that great city, which was in the same three & twentieth yeer of Nabuchadnezzar, is not unprobably thought by good authors to have been at the return from this Egyptian expedition. But whereas Josephus tels us, that there was another King put in the room of Apries by Nabuchadnezzar, we must understand, that he was only a Vice-roy, and not (as some have mistaken it) think that this was Amasis. For to place the beginning of Amasis his reign in the three and twentieth of Nabuchadnezzar, were as well repugnant unto the prophecies before alleged, as to all Chronology and History. Some there are, which to help this inconvenience, imagine that there were two successively bearing the name of Amasis; others, that there were two Apries, the one slain by Nabuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is only about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was deprived of life & Kingdome by the Assyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries, of whom the Greek Historians wrote, could not be the Deputy of Nabuchadnezzar, seeing that he was the Grand-child of Pharao Necho, and made war (as they report) upon the Phœnicians, who were, before the Egyptians, become subject unto the Crown of Babylon. I might adde, perhaps, that he whom Nabuchadnezzar left as Governour of Egypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldean or Assyrian, than Egyptian name; unlesse we should think that he had been a traitor to his naturall Prince, and so rewarded by the Conqueror with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were but frivolous to dispute. Thus much in brief we ought to beleeve, that Nabuchodonosor made an absolute Conquest of Egypt; that he was not so foolish as to give it away, any man may gheese; that he appointed one to rule the Country, it is consequent unto the former, and hath authority of Josephus; that his Governour (or some Successour of his) was afterwards taken and slain by Amasis, I see probability enough to perswade my self, and yet can well be content, that others use their liberty, and beleeve what they list. As for the army which this Egyptian King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians, I hold them to be none other than the garrisons of mercenary souldiers which were left by the Assyrian for the guard of his Viceroy, and custody of the new subdued Province: as likewise the company returning from Cyrene & Barce, who together with the friends of such as were slain in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greek Historians, deposed and slew Apries. I take them to have been the Egyptian fugitives, which then recovered their own Country. Sure it is that this Prophecy of Ezekiel was verified, At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people where they were scattered, and I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, and will cause them to return into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be there a small Kingdome. If the Egyptian Priests alluded hereunto in the tale which they made of Amasis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with this or the like interpretation; if they devised matter that had no shadow of truth, only to keep the Greeks from knowledge of their Countries disgrace, then are they little to be regarded, since we know the truth with them. Ezek. 30. v. 13. & 14.

Of the sundry accounts drawn from sundry acts of Nabuchadnezzar, and of the destruction of Nineve, by him; the time of which action is uncertain.

THese victories brought the greatnesse of the Assyrian Empire to the full, & from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzars reign in sundry places of Scripture. To speak any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nabuchadnezzar his times, might seem to be the over-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note, that whereas Daniel was carried captive in the third yeer of Jehojakims reign (which ran along with some part of Nabuchadnezzars first year) and was kept in diet three years more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nabuchadnezzars Kingdom, wherein he interpreted the forgotten dream of the great Image, foreshewing the successe of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of divers places which refer sundry matters unto their set years, as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tels, that Egypt should be given in reward for the service done before Tyrus, during his prophecy in the seven and twentieth year; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth year: for these years held no dependance upon either the beginning of Dan. 1. & 2.

Nabuchad-

Nabuchadnezzars Kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet upon any of the captivities, but had reference to some memorable actions, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not easie to be found, nor worth the labour of uncertain search.

Of any War made by Nabuchadnezzar, after such time as he returned from the Conquest of Egypt, I doe not read: excepting that against Nineve, the destruction whereof was fore-told by the Prophet Nahum. Nineve had long before been taken by Merodach (as in due place hath been shewed) and together with the rest of Assyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldaan, as Jehojakim and Zedechias, tributary Kings of Juda, had done, tasted likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Nineve followed the Conquest of Egypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet made between this City, that was to fall, and the City of No in Egypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) impossible to find out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronology, that it was in the first of Nabuchadnezzars reign, the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disprove it. Whereas it is referred by some unto the first of his Monarchy, which began at the end of the Egyptian Wars; the whole Prophecy of Nahum which went between the one and the other, argueth strongly, that there was a longer space of time intercurrent. So that to enquire into the very year of this destruction, or other circumstances of the War, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person, or by his Lieutenants, were somewhat like unto the vain curiosity of Tyberius Cæsar, enquiring who was the Mother of Hecuba, or to the like idle pains which he should take, who would seek to learn what woman that Huzzab Queen of Nineve was, whose wofull captivity the same Prophet Nahum likewise did fore-tell.

§. XI.

Of the latter time of Nabuchadnezzar; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

OF the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I think there are no monuments extant, save those which we find among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these we may reckon his great works of Babylon, wherewith he pleased himself so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdom, by the might of my power, & for the honour of my Majesty? Surely if those things be true that are by Josephus rehearsed of him out of Berosus and Megasthenes, he might well delight himself with the contemplation of such goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately works, he raised those huge arches wherewith were born up the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the air, and equalling the tops of Mountains; which most sumptuous frame, that out-lasted all the remainder of the Assyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to have been reared, and finished in fifteen days.

Dan. 4. 27.

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we find little else recorded, than that (which indeed is most profitable for us to consider) his over-valuing of his own greatnesse abased him unto a condition inferiour to the poorest of men. And not undeservedly fell these judgements of God upon him. For whereas God had honoured him, not only with many victories, and much happinesse in his own life, but with a discovery of things to come after him, yea and had approved the certainty of his dream, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memory, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet; he nevertheless became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seen and acknowledged, that he caused a golden Image to be set up and worshipped; ordaining a cruell death as reward unto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was utterly repugnant to the law of him that is the Kings of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted, Velox oblivio veritatis, ut qui dudum servum Dei quasi Deum adoraverat, nunc statuam sibi fieri jubeat, ut ipse quasi Deus in statua adoraretur: A hastie forgetfulnesse of the truth, that he who so lately had worshipped (Daniel) the servant of God, as if he had been God himself, should now command a statua to be erected unto himself, wherein himself might be worshipped as God. From this impiety it pleased God to reclaime him, by the strange and wonderfull delivery of those blessed Saints out of the fiery fornace; who being thrown into it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatry, were assisted by an Angell; preserved from all harm of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, made a decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this devotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could bring forth fruit answerable to his hastie zeal. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dream of the terrible judgement hanging over his head, which Daniel expounded, adviſed him to break off his sin by righteousnesse, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poor, that there might be an healing of his errour. Hereby it seems that injustice and crueltie were the faults, for which he was threatned: but this threatning sufficed not unto his information. For, that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men, (according to the tenor of the dream and interpretation) yea, compelled to dwell with the beasts of the field, and made to eat grasse as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans judgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dream; and much more easily be forgotten at the years end. One whole years leasure to repent was given to this haughty Prince: which respite of the execution may seem to have bred in him a forgetfulnesse of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelve moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was so over-joyed and transported with a vain contemplation of his own seeming happinesse, that without all fear of Gods heavie judgement pronounced against him, he uttered those loftie words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Majesticall works which he had reared, as well beseeming his majestitall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voyce from heaven, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearsed over unto him the sentence again, which was fulfilled upon him the very same hour.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their own buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that ever I have read of any, that were punished for rejoycing in works of this kind (though it is hard in joy, or any passion of the mind, to keep a just measure) excepting onely this Nabuchadnezzar.

The like may be said of David: for other (and some very godly) Kings have mustred all their forces to the very last man; but few or none have been known to have been punished as David was. Surely I not only hold it lawfull to rejoyce in those good things wherewith God hath blessed us; but a note of much unthankfulnesse to entertain them with a sullen and unfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure clouds, hindring the influence of that blessed light, which clarifies the soule of man, and predisposeth it unto the brightnesse of eternall felicity; so that insolent joy, which man in the pride of his vain imagination conceiveth of his own worth, doth above all other passions blast our minds, as it were with lightning, and make us to reflect our thoughts upon our seeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilest him, to whom we are indebted for our very being. Wherefore these Mala mentis gaudia; The evill joyes of the minds were not unaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of hell, and placed further inward than sorrows, cares, and fear, not far from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainly it is no unlikely token of vengeance neer at hand, when these unreasonable flushes of proud and vain joy, doe rage in a mind, that should have been humbled with a just repentance, and acknowledgement of ill deserving.

This was verified upon Nabuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and unexampled. For he ran among beasts in the fields and woods, where for seven years he lived, not onely as a salvage man, but as a salvage beast; for a beast he thought himself, secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore fed himself in the same manner, and with the same food that beasts do; Not that he was changed in figure externall, according to Mediana, insomuch as he appeared a beast to other mens eyes, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) speaks of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was hee changed as Iphigenia the daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius dreamed: but according to S. Jeromes exposition of these words: At the same time was my understanding restored unto me, &c. Quando dicit (saith S. Jerome) sensum sibi redditum, ostendit non formam se amisisse, sed mentem; When hee saith that his sense was restored unto him, he shewed that he had not lost his humane shape, but his understanding. Seven years expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his understanding, and his estate, for which he acknowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and everlasting being; that he was the Lord

Dan. 4. 32. 34. of heaven and earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his wayes righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his salvation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret, Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthasar, because Esay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapters, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon joyntly.

§. XII.
of Evilmerodach.

HAving already spoken what I could of the succession and years of Nebuchadnezzars posterity; the most that may be said of him, is said of Evilmerodach, which I will not here again rehearse.

He lost some part of that which his father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that consumed it to ashes. Hee lost Egypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth year of his reign, which was forty years after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amasis four and forty years of reign; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fifty, saying, that he died in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Egypt. There were indeed but seven and thirty years, which passed between the second year of the four and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Evilmerodach, and the first Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his reign, wherein he wan Egypt; of which seven and thirty years it is credibly held, that Psammitirus, the son of Amasis, reigned three: so that Amasis could bee no longer King than four and thirty years. But seeing that these two Greek Historians have been abused by Egyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no marvell though they were also deceived in the length of his reign. This is the plain answer to this objection. For to say either that the numbers were mis-written, and four and forty set down in stead of four and thirty, or that Amasis did temporise a while with the Assyrian, and not bear himself as absolute King of Egypt, untill the nineteenth of Evilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath been proved out of Ezechiel, that Egypt became again a Kingdome) I hold it a superfluous excuse.

Whether these Egyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deal with Evilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame and reputation, gotten by the decayed valour of his people, than in present forces; or whether (as I rather think) some foyl received by the Assyrian invading Media, emboldned the Egyptians to rebell against him, I will neither undertake, nor seek to define. Xenophon tels, that the first service of young Xenoph. Cyropæd. lib. 1. Cyrus in warre, was under Astyages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set upon him; at which time Cyrus was fifteen or sixteen years old. If therefore Cyrus lived threescore and three years (as Xenoph. Cyropæd. lib. 8. he is said to have died well stricken in years) which is held to be the ordinary term of no short life, then was this encounter in the third year of Evilmerodach his reign. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early between these Nations, for as much as the manner of their fight in former times, with other circumstances insinuating as much, are found in the same place of Xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonosor gave courage unto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand upon prouder termes with the Assyrian, than in his flourishing estate they durst have used. Howsoever the quarrell began, we find that it ended not before the last ruine of the Assyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which he received by the Medes and their Allies the Persians, drew unto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the lesser Asia, with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to over-whelm his enemies with a strong Invasion, whom in vain hee had fought to wearie out with a lingring Warre.

This

This happened after the death of Astyages, who left the world in the nineteenth year of Evilmerodach, at which time Amasis took possession of Egypt. So that the Assyrian having his hands already full of businesse, which more earnestly did affect him, seemes thereby to have given the better meanes unto the Egyptians, of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did sundry times find occasion to rebell in after-ages, and set up a King within in self, against the far more mighty Persian.

The issue of these great preparations made by Evilmerodach against the Medes, was such as opened the way unto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many years before uttered against Babel, by Esay and Jeremy.

For, the Assyrians and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Persians under their thick showres of arrowes and darts, were encountred with an army of stout and wel-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Evilmerodach was slain. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonosor had raised and up-held, being shaken and grievously crackt under his unfortunat son, was left to be sustained by his unworthy Nephew; a man more likely to have overthrown it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

§. XIII.

A private conjecture of the Author, serving to make good those things, which are cited out of Berosus, concerning the Successors of Evilmerodach, without wrong to the truth. The qualitie, and death of Balthasar.

THough I have already (as it seemes to me) sufficiently proved that Balthasar was the Son, and immediate Successour to Evilmerodach, yet considering earnestly the conjectures of those Writers, which following Berosus, insert Nigliſar, or Nirigliſſoroor, and his son Labassardach between them; as also that which I find in Herodotus of Nitocris, a famous Queen of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that City, I have thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what means it was possible that some errour might have crept into the Historie of those times, and thereby have brought us to a needlesse trouble of searching out the truth, as it were by candle-light, in the uncertain fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered only to the Scriptures. First therefore I observe, that the time which Berosus divides betwixt Evilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the years in which Nebuchadnezzar lived wild among brute beasts in the open field: Secondly, that the suddennesse of this accident, which came in one hour, could not but work much perturbation in that State, wherein doubtlesse the honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamity pitied, and his restitution hoped, the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that clause which promised his recoverie, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for setling the government, whilest the King was thus distracted, wee shall find it most likely, that his Son and Heir did occupie the Royall Throne, with condition to restore it unto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Evilmerodach being to supply the utter want of understanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the unripenesse of a young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolences, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That he had in him very small abilitie of government, it appeares by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his own right. That his sister Nitocris (if Nitocris were his sister) was a woman of an high spirit, Herodot. lib. 1. it appeares by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying, that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and usefull works about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Assyrians, and amongst them Ninive. Wherefore it were not unreasonable to think, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers misgovernment, used practices to get the rule into her own hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leave it unto her ungracious son. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have reigned, wee doe not find; but wee find in Berosus (as Josephus hath cited him) that Nigliſar, who got the Kingdom from Evilmerodach, was his sisters husband; usband; which argues this to have been the same woman. As for Labassardach the son of Nigliſſar, if at the end of nine moneths reign he were for his lewd conditions slain by the Nobility, as the same Berosus reporteth, it seemes that God prepared hereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose term of punishment was then expired) by raising such trouble, as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here use many words to confute that which Berosus hath further set down of Evilmerodach, telling us that he was slain by his sisters husband: for the plain words of the Scripture, naming the year wherein he gave liberty to Jechonia, do plainly testifie that he out-lived the three or four and fortieth year of his Fathers reign, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to have succeeded Evilmerodach in the Kingdom, might indeed have so done, though not when he held it in his own right. Of Balthasar, who was his Son and Heir, we find, that he had such conditions, as God permitted to be in a King for the ruin of the people. Hee was from his young years of a mischievous nature; having in his Fathers time slain a Noble young-man that should have married his sister, only for spight and envie to see him kill two wild beasts in hunting, at which himself having thrown his Javeline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beauty, said it were a happie woman that should be his wife. Such barbarous villanies caused many which had loved his Father (as a good and gracious, though unfortunate Prince) to revolt from him unto the enemie as soon as hee was King. Neither doe I find that hee performed any thing worthy of record, but as a coward and a fool he lost all; sitting stil, and not once daring to give battell to them that daily took somwhat from him. Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on every side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom he had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a fool taken in unexcusable security, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of fear, but was terrified with a dreadful vision; which had shewed his ruin not in many houres before, even whilest he was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting enemies drew out of him, together with his latest bloud. It is therefore in this place enough to say of him, That after a dishonourable reign of seventeen years, he perished like a beast, and was slain as he deserved. The rest that concerneth him in question of his time, hath been spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrus, to whose story, that of Balthasar is but an appendix.

CHAP. II.

Of the originall and first greatnesse of the Persians.

§. I.

That the Medes were chief actors in the subversion of the Babylonian Empire.

THE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assyria, was joyned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Assyria and of Media it self.

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings besides himself, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provinciall Governours having cut down the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided between them the Eastern Empire. Cyaxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces, dying about two years after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthasar; the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Family, namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achæmenes thhe Princes of which bloud reigning in Persia, had formerly formerly been dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the world.

Of the Familie of the Achæmenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter find occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third son of Japhet; that they had Kings soon after the Floud, Lactantius and Diodorus have found record; For Lactantius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodore speaketh of Pharnus with his seven sons, slain by the Assyrians in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Assyrians, I take the list and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these;

Arbaces	reigned	28. years.
Sosarmus		30. years.
Medidus		40. years.
Cardiceas		13. years.
Diocles		53. years.
Phraortes		24. years.
Cyaxares		32. years.
Astyages		38. years.
Darius Medus.

And though the Greeks ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach us, that Darius was not only King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armie victorious over Balthasar was his; as the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his own life. For we find in Daniel, that Darius of the Medes took the Kingdome being threescore and two years old: And further, what Officers it pleased him to set over the Kingdome. And so was it prophecied by Isay long before: Behold, I will stir up the Medes against them, &c. And by Jeremie, The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for his purpose is against Babel to destroy it; and in the eight and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Julius Africanus doth well open, who taking authoritie from Diodore, Castor, Thallus, and others, delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus began to reign; which also agreeth with Strabo, where he saith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Assyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therefore the reports of Justine and Herodotus are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone. Cap. 13. v. 17. 51. v. 11. & 28. Lib. 16.

By what means the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

HOw the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the conquest of Babel to the Persians only. For some there are who deny that Astyages had any other Successor than Cyrus his grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrary side affirmeth, that Cyrus was no way descended from Astyages (whom he calleth Astigas or Apania) but only that having vanquished him in battell, and confined him to Bactria, he married his Daughter Amytis. But I find the relations of Ctesias often cited, and seldome followed, and himself sometimes very justly reproved of wilfull untruth.

Viginier, a diligent and learned historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such son as Cyaxares, or Darius Medus; and to confirm this opinion the more, he citeth Diodore, Justine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, Isocrates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon; who do not find any such successor. Neither do Tatianus, Theophilus Antiochenus, Julius Africanus, Clemens Alexandrinus, Justine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Successor to Astyages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negativè, doth never inforce consent; we may be the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleged notwithstanding) to affirm, that either Astyages himself must have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or else to give him some other Successor, according to Josephus and Xenophon, the same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest and without dispute, that the King of the Medes commanded in chief, and was absolute Lord of that Conquest, Cyrus during his life, being no other than the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subject to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassals of Darius, being joyned together to compound it.

Zon. l. 1. c. 19.
Jos. an. l. 10. c. 12.
Xen. l. 8. Pæd.

But it is very certain that the honour of that great victorie over Babylon was wholly given to Cyrus, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himself for this action, but for the deliverie of his Church; a greater work not only in the eyes of God, than the subversion of any State or Monarchie how powerfull soever.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers employed in that service did rather ascribe the glory to him that was the best man of war, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling upon Cyrus by succession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the fame of his vertue; which among prophane Historians overgrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both becaus he was old, and did nothing in person; as also becaus he soon after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possest of whatsoever belonged to Darius, before the fame of any such King or Conqueror was carried far off.

And for the Greek Historians, they took all things from the relation of the Persians, who gave to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equal. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and fixt Chapters of his Prophecie, makes it plain, that himself not onely lived a great Officer under King Darius, but that he continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus; which being the year of Daniels Death, could not have been distinguished from the reign of Darius, if they had begun together and reigned joyntly: Neither can it be imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus began after him.

§. III.

Xenophons relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with joynt forces upon the Assyrians and others.

THese Testimonies of the Scriptures, which need no other confirmation, yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these wars: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Assyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, he began to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his subjection, there should not then be left any Nation adjoyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foot, and ten thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being joyned, made an exceeding strong Armie.

The Assyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, invited Cræsus King of Lydia, a Prince very mighty both in men and treasure, and with him other Lords of Asia the lesse, to his assistance, alleging, that those Eastern Nations were very powerfull, and so firmly conjoyned by league and many alliances, that it would not be easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to resist them. With these incitements, and strengthened with great presents, he drew to himself so many adherents, as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thousand foot, and threescore thousand horse; of which, ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot were led by Cræsus, who had great cause of enmitie with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father Alyattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus Generall of the Persian forces, utterly broken; Upon which defeat the Assyrian King being also slain, so many of the Assyrians revolted, as Babylon it self could not longer be assured without the succours of Mercenaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Egypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, possest himself of a great part of the lesser Asia; at which time it was, as I take it, that Cræsus himself was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soon after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his sisters son, prevailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set down.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him levied, are numbred thirty thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the common sort were Archers, or such as used the Dart or Sling. So far Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the pattern of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: so it cannot be denied, but that the bulk and grosse of his Narration was founded upon meer Historicall truth.

Neither can it indeed be affirmed of any the like writers, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himself to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his own invention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politick discourse, and examining but the Historie of things done, it will easily appear, that Xenophon hath handled his under-taken subject in such sort, that by beautifying the face thereof, he hath not in any sort corrupted the body.

§. IV.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great War.

FOr it is commonly agreed upon, that Achamenes the sonne of Perses being Governour of Persia, did associate himself with Arbaces, who commanded in Media, in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himself the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Assyrians; as also that they conveyed over the same honour and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, untill such time as Deioces took upon him the full authoritie and majestie of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the reign of Deioces, are usually accounted about an hundred and forty years, in the last sixty whereof there reigned in Assyria mighty Princes, namely, Salmanassar and his Successors; whose great atchievements in Syria and elsewhere, witnesse, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their advantage to undertake any offensive war against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet between these the successors of Belochus and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Astyagas, there past above ninetie years, in which, if Herodotus have written truly, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their Dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had been but an unadvised enterprise of the Assyrians and Babylonians, to have wasted themselves against the Syrians and Egyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backs. But that the Medes had done nothing upon the South parts of Persia; and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Governour for the Babylonian in Susa, or Susan, the chief City thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cyaxares or Astyages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Cræsus, which after some six years dispute was compounded.

How the affairs of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It seemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then possest, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gave them more securitie than fame: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achamenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not have suffered any forgetfulnesse thereof. But as we find all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those countries to be very consonant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appears, that the race of Achamenes held the Principalitie of Persia from Father to Son for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth, That Cambyſes the father of Cyrus was King of Perſia, than to thoſe that make him a mean man, and ſay, that Aſtyages gave him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her ſon (whoſe nativitie he feared) might be diſabled from any great undertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cauſe of grief could it be to Aſtyages, that the ſon of his daughter ſhould become Lord of the beſt part of Aſia? No, it was more likely, that upon ſuch a Prophecie his love to his grand-child ſhould have encreaſed, and his care been the greater to have married her to ſome Prince of ſtrength and eminent vertue.

Yea, the ſame Herodotus, who is the firſt Author, and as I think the deviſer of the miſchief intended againſt Cyrus by his Grandfather, doth confeſſe, That the line of the Achamenida was ſo renowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his proſperitie did thence derive himſelf, and vaunt of it: which he would never have done, had they been ignoble, or had they been the vaſſals of any other King or Monarch.

For in this ſort Xerxes in the ſeventh of Herodotus deriveth himſelf.

Cambyſes.	Ariaramnes.	Darius.
Cyrus.	Arſamnes.	Xerxes.

Of the Achamenida there were two races: of the firſt was Cyrus the great, whoſe iſſue male failed in his two ſons, Cambyſes and Smerdis. This royall familie is thus ſet down by the learned Reineccius.

Achamenes, the ſon of Perſes, firſt King of Perſia.
Darius.
Cyrus, the firſt of that name, had Cambyſes, and Atoſſa, who married to Pharnaces, King of Cappadocia, had Artyſtona and other daughters.
Cambyſes had Cyrus the Great: Cyrus had Cambyſes, who ſucceeded him, and Smerdis, ſlain by his brother Cambyſes.

Of the ſecond were thoſe ſeven great Princes of Perſia, who having overthrown the uſurped royaltie of the Magi, choſe from among themſelves Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, King.

This Kingdome of Perſia was firſt known by the name of Elam, ſo called after Elam the ſon of Sem, and the people therein inhabiting, Elamita; by Elianus, Elyma; by Joſephus, Elymi.

Suidas derives this Nation ſometimes from Aſſur, ſometimes from Magog, of whom they were called Maguſai, which Maguſai, according to Euſebius, are not to be taken for the Nation in generall, but for thoſe that were afterward called the Magi or Wiſemen. So doe the Greeks, among many other their ſayings of them, affirm, That the Perſians were anciently written Artai, and that they called themſelves Cephenes. But that they were Elamita, Moſes and the Prophets, Eſay, Jeremie, Ezekiel, Daniel and Eſdras, in many places confirm: Which alſo S. Hierome upon Jeremie the five and twentieth, upon Daniel the eighth, and alſo in his Hebrew queſtions, approveth, ſaying: Elam, à quo Elamita Principes Perſidis; Elam, of whom were the Elamites Princes of Perſia.

And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the old Perſepolis; for Alexander at the requeſt of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The firſt King of Perſia to us known, if we follow the current of Authors interpreting the fourteenth chapter of Geneſis, was Chedorlaomer, who lived with Amraphel or Ninus, and joyned with him in the war againſt thoſe Arabians; who was afterward extinguiſhed by the forces of Abraham.

CHAP. III.

Of Cyrus.

§. I.

Of Cyrus his name, and first actions.

AS touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo saith, That the same was taken from a river which watereth Persia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name. Herodotus otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people. Strab. l. 15.

It is true, that for his Justice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I think it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to say as the Sun, in the same Language. Howsoever it be, yet the Prophet Esay, almost two hundred years before Cyrus was born, gives him that name, Thus saith the Lord unto Cyrus his Anointed, &c. Plut. in vit. Art. x.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto subject, together with the taking of Cræsus himself, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orosius, and others, but placed among his latter atchievements: whose opinion for this difference of time is founded upon two reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last war against Cræsus; and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victorie which Cyrus had over Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have bin used (and was by the Greeks) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having won Babylon it self, which in due place I have answered. The latter seems to have reference to the second War which Cyrus made upon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time he so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleeve with Herodotus, whom the most of Chronologers follow, and find the enterprise of Sardis to precede that of Babylon.

§. II.

Of Cræsus the King of Lydia, who made War upon Cyrus.

I Have in the last Book spoken somewhat of Cræsus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which governed Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors known) was Lydus the son of Atys: which Familie extinguished, the kingdom was by an Oracle conferred upon Argon, descended from Hercules, whereof there were two and twentie generations, Candaules being the last, who by shewing his fair wife naked to Gyges his favorite, he was by the same Gyges (thereto urged upon perill of his own life by the Queen) the next day slain. Which done, Gyges enjoyed both the Queen and the Kingdom of Lydia, and left the same to Atys his son, who was father to Sadyattes, the father of Halyattes (who thrust the Cimmerians out of Asia) and Halyattes begat Cræsus. Which five Kings, of a third race, enjoyed that kingdom an hundred and seventie years. Halyattes the father of Cræsus was an undertaking Prince, and after he had continued a war against Cyaxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it six years, a peace was concluded upon equall conditions between them. Herod. l. 1 p. 3. 4. & 5.

Astyages, the son of Cyaxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himself greatly honoured by obtaining Aryenes, Cræsus sister, whom he married.

But Cræsus so far enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territory to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were four in effect of equall strength, to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Egyptian, and the Lydian: only Nabuchodonosor, after he had joyned Phœnicia, Palastina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no Competitor during his own life.

But Cræsus, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrell of the Babylonians, he yet mastered Æolis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces possest by the Greeks in Asia the lesse, adjoyning to Lydia; gave law to the Phrigians, Bithynians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforc'd the Ephesians to acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Diana's girdle, Herodotus witnesseth. Moreover, Athenæus out of Berosus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victorie which Cræsus obtained against the Sacæans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memory whereof the Babylonians his allies did yearly celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacæa: All which he performed in fourteen years.

Athe. l. 14. c. 17

And being now confident in the continuance of his good fortune, and envious of Cyrus fame, doubting also, that his prosperous undertakings might in the end grow perilous to himself, he consulted with the Oracle of Apollo, whom he presented with marvellous rich gifts, what successe he might hope for against Cyrus, if he undertook him: from whom he received this riddle; Crœsus, passing over the River Halys, shall dissolve a great Dominion. For the devill being doubtfull of the successe, payed him with merchandize of both sides alike, and might be inverted either way, to the ruin of Persia, or of his own Lydia.

§. III.

Crœsus his Expedition against Cyrus.

HEreupon Cræsus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, if he could, despised all the arguments used by Sandanes to the contrary, who desired him to fore-think, That he urged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous region; a people not covered with the soft silk of worms, but with the hard skins of beasts; not fed with such meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine: and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; over whom if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himself in nothing but fame, in which he already excelled: and if by them beaten, and subjected, so great would his losse appear of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceived.

Notwithstanding this solid coûsel, Cræsus having prepared a powerful army, he led the same toward Media, but in his passage he was arrested at Pterium, a City of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all means to surprise or to force, Cyrus came on, & found the Lydians encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not find: for out of doubt, Cræsus, as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilitie; so was he not under any in territorie and fame that then lived.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they favoured a disturber and usurper of the Common-weale against him who fought for the Romane libertie, That Kingdoms and Common-weals had their encrease and period from divine Ordinance: so at this time was the winter of Cræsus prosperitie at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall, and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not Admetus Herdman, Apollo, had given a date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the other.

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainment of divers skirmishes, the Persians and Lydians began to joyn in grosse troops: supplies from both Kings thrust on upon the falling off, and advancement of either Nations: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the dark vaile of night had hidden each Armie from the others view, Cræsus doubting what successe the rising Sun would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speed possible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recovered Sardis his first Citie and Regall Seat, without any pursuit made by Cyrus to retard him. Where being arrived, and nothing

suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other War for that Winter, he dismissed the Souldiers, and sent the troops of his sundrie Nations to their own Provinces, appointing them to re-assemble at the end of five months, acquainting his Commanders with his intents for the renewing of the War at the time appointed.

§. IV.

The Conquest of Lydia by Cyrus.

Cyrus in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his Armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heels, as to be discovered. But having good intelligence of Cræsus his proceeding, he so measured his marches, as he presented not himself before Sardis, till such time as Cræsus had disposed his Armie to their wintring garrisons: which being altogether unlooked for, and unfeared, he surrounded Sardis with his Armie; Wherein Cræsus having no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Guards, after fourteen days siege the same was entred by assault, and all executed that resisted. Cræsus having now neither arms to fight, nor wings to flie, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, thrust himself into the heap and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had undergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a son of his, who had been dumb all his life (by extremitie of passion and fear enabled) cried out to the Souldiers to spare Cræsus. Who thereupon being taken and imprisoned, despoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied in fetters, and set on the top of a great and high heap of wood, to be consumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembring the discourse which he had with the Athenian Law-giver, he thrice cried out on his name, Solon, Solon, Solon: and being demanded what he meant by that invocation, he first used silence; but urged again, he told them, That he had now found it true which Solon had long since told them, That many men in the race and courses of their lives might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could discern himself for happy indeed, till his end.

In communi calamitate suam quisque habet fortunam, Curt. Memoriam metus perimit: timor vocis est incitamentum, &c. Solin. c. 7.

Of which answer Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of fortune, and his own mortalitie, he commanded his ministers of Justice to withdraw the fire with all diligence, to save Cræsus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demanded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? or what self reason had conducted him to invade his territory, and to make him of a friend an enemie? To whom he thus answered; It was thy prosperous, and my unprosperous destiny (the Grecian god flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inventers and conductors of Cræsus War against Cyrus.

Homo qui in homine calamitoso misericors est, meminit sui, Cass.

Cyrus being pierc't with Cræsus answer, & bewailing his estate, though victorious over it, did not only spare his life, but entertained him ever after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Quæ non causam, sed fortunam spectat.

And herein is the reall difference discerned between that behaviour which we call beneficium latronis, and gratiam Principis: A theef sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but unjustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being, to him that was the cause and author of his own evill.

The report made by Xenophon, is, That Cyrus did friendly entertain Cræsus at the first sight, not mentioning that which Herodotus delivers, and is here already set down, that he should have bin burnt alive. It may very well be, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell, fitter to be forgotten than rehearsed, as too much mis-beseeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that neernesse of alliance might with-hold Cyrus (had he bin otherwise vicious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsoever it was, the morall part of the Storie hath given much credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for currant, though the trust reposed in Cræsus afterwards may seem to argue, that Cyrus did not use him inhumanly at the first.

For as Herodotus himself telleth us, when Cyrus past with his Armie over Araxes into Scythia, he left Cræsus to accompany and advise his son Cambyses, Governour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of Cyrus, & did afterward follow

Cambyses

Cambyſes into Egypt, where he hardly eſcaped his tyrannous hand. What his end was, I do not find.

But in this time the races of three of the greateſt Kings in that part of the world took end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians, in Balthaſar, Cyaxares, and Cræſus.

§. V.

How Cyrus won Babylon.

After this Lydian War enſued the great Conqueſt of Babylon, which gave unto Cyrus an Empire ſo large and mightie, that he was juſtly reputed the greateſt Monarch then living upon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action took up, it is uncertain; only it ſeems, that ten whole years did paſſe between his taking thoſe two Cities of Sardis and Babylon; which nevertheleſſe I doe not think to have bin wholly occupied in proviſion for the Aſſyrian war, but rather to have bin ſpent in ſetling the Eſtate which he had already purchaſed. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Cteſias hath in his fragments, of a war made by Cyrus upon the Scythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained againſt Cræſus. He telleth us, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious over that Nation, took Amorges their King priſoner: but being in a ſecond battell overthrown by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was delivered for the other.

Likewiſe it may be thought, that no ſmall part of thoſe troubles which aroſe in the lower Aſia, grew ſoon after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conqueſt was fully eſtabliſhed.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Aſia the leſſe, many Nations, conquered formerly by Cræſus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; againſt whom he imployed Paſtias, and then Harpagus, who firſt reduced the Phocians under their former obedience, and then the reſt of the Greeks inhabiting Aſia the leſſe, as the Ionians, Carians, Æolians, and Lycians, who reſolvedly (according to the ſtrength they had) defended themſelves. But in the attempt upon Babylon it ſelf, it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before-hand, that nothing ſhould be able to divert him, or to raiſe that ſiege, and make fruſtrate the work upon which he did ſet all his reſt. And great reaſon there was, that he ſhould bend all his care and ſtrength unto the taking of that citie, which beſide the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was ſo ſtrongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and ſurrounded with waters unfoordable, ſo plentifully victualled for many years, that the inhabitants were not only free from all doubt and fear of their eſtate, but deſpiſed and derided all purpoſes and power of their beſiegers.

The only hope of the Medes and Perſians, who deſpaired of carrying by aſſault a Citie ſo wel fortified and manned, was in cutting off all ſupplies of victuals and other neceſſaries wherof though the Town was ſaid to be ſtored ſufficiently for more than 20. years, yet might it well be deemed, that in ſuch a world of people as dwelt within thoſe gates, one great want or other would ſoon appear, & vanquiſh the reſolution of that unwarlike multitude. In expecting the ſucceſs of this courſe, the beſiegers were likely to endure much travel, & all in vain, if they did not keep ſtreight watch & ſtrong guards upon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vaſt circuit of thoſe wals which they were to gird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men ſufficiently aſſured unto their commander: The conſideration whereof miniſtred unto the Babylonians matter of good paſtime, when they ſaw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and others, quartered about their Town to keep them in, who having bin their ancient friends and allies, were more likely to joyn with them, if occaſion were offered, than to uſe much diligence on the behalf of Cyrus, who had, as it were, yeſterday layd upon their necks the galling yoak of ſervitude. Whilſt the beſieged were pleaſing themſelves in this deceitfull and vain gladneſſe, that is the ordinary fore-runner of ſudden calamitie, Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made ſtrong, conſtant, and inventive, deviſed by ſo many channels and trenches as were ſufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the ſame from the walls of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and aſſured: which when by the labour of many hands he had performed, he he ſtayed the time of his advantage for the execution: for he had left certain bankes or heads un-cut, between the main river which ſurrounded the Citie, and his own Trenches.

Now Balthaſar, finding neither any want or weakneſs within, nor any poſſibilitie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding ſumptuous feaſt, publike Playes, and other Paſtimes, and thereto invited a thouſand of his Princes or Nobilitie, beſides his wives, curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the beſiegers know, that his proviſions were either ſufficient, not onely for all needfull uſes, but even for jollitie and exceſſe; or becauſe he hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many diſtreſſes were well neere broken; or in honour of Bel his moſt reverenced Idoll; or that it was his birth or coronation day; or for many or all theſe reſpects. And he was not contented with ſuch magnificance as no Prince elſe could equall, but (uſing Daniels words) He lifted himſelf up againſt the Lord of Heaven: for he and his Princes, wives and concubines, made carowſing cups of the Veſſels of God, in contempt of whom he praiſed his own puppets, made of Silver and Gold, of Braſſe, Iron, Wood, and Stone; Quanta fuit ſtultitia in veſibus aureis bibentes, lignea & lapideos deos laudare? How great a fooliſhneſſe was it (ſaith S. Hierome) drinking in golden Cups, to praiſe gods of Wood and Stone? While Balthaſar was in this ſort triumphing, and his brains well filled with vapors, he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall oppoſite unto him, certain words which he underſtood not: wherewith ſo great a fear and amazement ſeized him, as the ioynts of his loyns were looſed, and his knees ſmote one againſt the other. Which paſſion when he had in ſome part recovered, he cried out for his Chaldæans, Aſtrologians, and Soothſayers, promiſing them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the kingdome to him that could read and expound the writing: but it exceeded their Art. In this diſturbance and aſtoniſhment, the Queen hearing what had paſt, and of the Kings amazement, after reverence done, uſed this ſpeech: There is a man in thy Kingdome, in whom is the ſpirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father, light, and underſtanding, and wiſedome, like the wiſedome of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King Nabuchodonoſor, thy father, the King (I ſay) thy father made chief of the Inchanters, aſtrologians, Chaldæans, and Soothſayers, becauſe a more excellent ſpirit, and knowledge, and underſtanding, &c. were found in him, even in Daniel, &c. Now let Daniel be called, and he will declare the interpretation. Dan. 5. 8.

This Queen, Joſephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthaſar, either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that ſhe was not any of the Kings wives, becauſe abſent from the feaſt; and being paſt the age of dancing and banquetting, ſhe came in upon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his diſtraction. And whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others both of younger years and times, this old Queen remembred well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonoſor, grandfather to this Balthaſar, and kept in mind both his religion and divine gifts. Orig. & Theod. in Dan. Joſeph. Ant. 10.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings preſence, who acknowledged thoſe excellent graces wherewith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promiſes of reward and honour, to read and interpret thoſe words miraculouſly written; to whom Daniel made anſwer in a farre different ſtyle from that hee uſed towards his Grandfather: for the evill which he foretold Nabuchodonoſor, he wiſhed that the ſame might befall his enemies; but to this King (whoſe neglect of God, and vice, he hated) he anſwered in theſe words, Keep thy rewards to thy ſelf, and give thy gifts to another, yet will I read the writing unto the King, and ſhew him the interpretation. Which before he had performed, he gave him firſt the cauſe of Gods juſt judgement againſt him, and the reaſon of this terrible ſentence, whereof the King and all his Wiſe men were utterly ignorant. Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodneſſe to his Father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of thoſe benefits, as hee deprived him of his eſtate and underſtanding, ſo upon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite power he reſtored him to both. This King notwithſtanding lifted himſelf up againſt the ſame God, and preſuming both to abuſe thoſe veſſels dedicated to holy uſes, and neglecting the Lord of all power, praiſed and worſhipped the dead Idols of Gold, Silver, Braſſe, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore thoſe words, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene, Tekel, Upharſin, Dan. 5. 18. 19, 20.

gave the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his king dome, and finished it; That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day wherein Balthasar feasted and perished, Cyrus, either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himself, whose ensign he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to invite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no lesse filled with the vapors of wine, than their hearts with the fear of Gods judgement, he caused all the banks and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them hee drew the great River of Euphrates dry for the present, by whose channell running, his Armie made their entrance, finding none to disturb them. All the Town lay buried (as the Poet saith) in sleep and wine: such as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, unlesse they saved themselves by flight, as some did, who ran away crying, and filling the streets with an uncertain tumult.

Such Assyrian Lords as had revolted from Balthasar, and betaken themselves to the party of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Palace, which having easily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banquetting, slew both him and them without any mercie, who struggled in vain to keep those lives which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the prophecie of Jeremie fulfilled, and that of Esay, two hundred years before this subversion, who in his seven and fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writeth this destruction so feelingly and lively, as if he had been present both at the terrible slaughter there committed, and had seen the great and unfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrows and bewailings of every surviving soul thereunto subject. His Prophecie of this place he beginneth in these words; Come down, and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no Throne, &c. And again, Sit still and get thee into darkness, O daughter of the Chaldæans, for thou shalt no more be called the Lady of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God used Nabuchodonosor and the Chaldæans, to punish the Idolatrie of the Judæans, yet Esay teacheth us in this place, That he did not yet forget, that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitie. For (saith Esay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine inheritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didst shew them no mercy, but thou didst lay thy very heavy yoak upon the antient. I will rise up against them, saith the Lord of Hosts, and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the son and the nephew. And in the thirteenth, Every one that is found, shall be stricken therew: and whosoever joyneth himself, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their eies, their houses spoyled, and their wives ravished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victory of Cyrus, or that received the report from others truly as it was, that could better leave the same to posteritie after it happened, than Esay hath done in many places of his Prophecies, which were written two hundred years before any thing attempted.

Jer. 27. Esay 47.

Cap. 47.

Isai. 14. To wit, Evilmerodath and Balthasar.

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors set down, might seem altogether fabulous: for, besides the reports of Saint Hierome, Solinus, and Orosius, Aristotle in the third of his Politicks, the second Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the Citie knew not that the rest was taken three dayes after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of Diodorus Siculus may be taken; who finds the compasse thereof at three hundred and threescore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes five and forty miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, that six Chariots might passe in front theron. And of height, according to Ctesias and Clitarchus, three hundred threescore and five foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his sixteenth Book of Geographie gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twenty furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred fourscore and five furlongs, which makes eight and fortie mile and one furlong, but finds the wall farre under that which Diodore reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hundred cubits, which is also very much; every cubit containing a foot and half of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citie he gives the same with Siculus, and eight furlongs more. Herodotus finds a greater content than Strabo doth, namely, foure hundred and fourſcore furlongs circle; the thickneſſe of the wall he meaſures at fiftie cubits, and the height at two hundred of the ſame regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Braſſe, with poſts and hooks to hang them on of the ſame metall: and therefore did the Prophet Eſay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princeſſe and Glory of Kingdomes. Her. l. 1. Eſay 47. & 13.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he ſtript her out of her Princely Robes, and made her a ſlave; dividing not onely all her goodly houſes, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his Souldiers; but beſtowing the inhabitants themſelves as bond-ſlaves upon thoſe that had taken poſſeſſion of their goods.

Touching the reign of Cyrus, and the time which he enjoyed in reſt and pleaſure, I can ſay no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have laſted only ſeven years: in which time he made ſuch Conſtitutions as differ little from the Ordinances of all wiſe Kings that are deſirous to eſtabliſh a Royall power to themſelves and their poſteritie.

§. VI.

The end of Cyrus.

THe laſt warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diverſly written. Herodotus and Juſtine deliver, That after the Conqueſt of Aſia the leſſe, Cyrus invaded the Maſſagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, governed by Tomyris their Queen: and that in an incounter between the Perſians and theſe Northern Nomades, Tomyris loſt her Armie, and her Son Spargapiſes that commanded it: In revenge whereof, this Queen making new levies of men of War, and following the War againſt Cyrus, in a ſecond battell beat the Perſian Armie, and taking Cyrus priſoner, cut off his head from his body, and caſt the ſame into a boule of bloud, uſing theſe words; Thou that haſt all thy life time thirſted for bloud, now drink thy fill, and ſatiate thy ſelf.

It ſhould hereby ſeem, that Cyrus knowing the ſtrength and multitude of thoſe frozen Nations, was perſwaded to abate their furie by ſome forcible invaſion and depopulation, becauſe in the time of Cyaxares, father to Aſtyages, thoſe Scythians invided Media and Aſia the leſſe, and held the ſame in a ſervile ſubjection eight and twenty years.

This war which Metaſthenes calleth Tomyrique, laſted (ſaith he) ſix years, and took end at the end of Cyrus.

But in this particular I believe with Viginier, that this Scythian War was rather the ſame which Cyrus made againſt the Sacians, before the conqueſt of Lydia, according to Cteſias before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliver the ſucceſſe of that war otherwiſe than Herodotus doth: The rather (ſaith Viginier) becauſe Strabo in his eleventh book reciteth, that Cyrus ſurprized the Sacians by the ſame ſtratagem by which Juſtine ſaith he defeated the ſon of Tomyris. And the ſame Cteſias alſo reporteth, That the laſt war which Cyrus made, was againſt Amorrhaus king of the Derbicians, a Nation (as the reſt) of Scythia; whom though he overcame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he ſuffered three dayes after. Vig. prim. part. Bib. Cte. l. 15. biſt. part.

Strabo alſo affirmeth, That he was buried in his own Citie of Paſagardes, which himſelf had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time, which is ſaid to have bin this: O vir, quicunque es, & undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoravi: Ego ſum Cyrus qui Perſis imperium conſtitui, puſillum hoc terræ quo meum tegitur corpus mihi ne invideas; O thou man, whoſoever thou art, or whenceſoever thou commeſt; for I was not ignorant that thou ſhouldeſt come: I am Cyrus that founded the Perſian Empire, doe not envie unto me this little earth, with which my body is covered. Strab. l. 15.

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either upon hope of treaſure, ſuppoſed to have been buried with him, or upon deſire to honour his dead body with certain ceremonies; in which there was found an old rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a ſword. The Coffin wherein his body lay, Alexander cauſed to be covered with his own garment, and a Crown of gold to be ſet upon it. Theſe things well conſidered, as they give credit to the reports of Xenophon and Zonaras, ſo they derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his body in the hands of Tomyris. Q. Curt. Xen. pæd. 8. Zon. l. 1. c. 20.

And

And surely, had Cyrus lost the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his son would so soon have transported all his remaining forces into Egypt, so farre off from that quarter; the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media: neither had Cambyses been able in such haste to have undertaken and performed so great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather believe Xenophon, saying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himself that he could not long enjoy the world, he called unto him his Nobilitie, with his two sons, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he assured himself, and taught others of the immortality of the Soul, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every man in this life; he exhorted his sons by the strongest arguments he had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things he uttered, which make it probable, that he received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when he governed Susa in Persia; and that Cyrus himself had read the Prophecie of Esay, wherein he was expressely named, and by God (for the delivery of his people) preordained. Which act of delivering the Jewes from their Captivitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest work that ever Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument of Gods power, used for the chastising of many Nations, and the establishing of a government in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing advancer of his Kingdome upon earth; which must last for ever, though heaven and earth shall perish.

§. VII.

Of Cyrus his Decree for building the Temple of God in Jerusalem.

HAving therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by sundrie Historians, the glory of all which was a reward of this his service done unto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meet at length to speak of the Decree made in the first of his Reign, being perhaps the first that ever hee made after his possession of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Jewes should return again into their own Territorie, and re-build the House of God in Jerusalem, having now endured and finished the threescore and ten years captivitie, by the Prophets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gave order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessary and wanting. He also restored unto them five thousand four hundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver, whereof Nabuchodonosor, the grandfather of Balthasar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

1 Esd. 2. 2 Esd. 7. Phil. in bre. The number of the Jewes which returned out of Chaldaa under their Leader Zorobabel, the son of Salathiel, and Nephew to King Jeconias, and Jesus or Josua the son of Josadak, were about fifty thousand; where, as soon as they arrived, they built an Altar to the living God, and sacrifised thereon, according to their own law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

1 Esd. 3. 3. Esd. 5. Esd. 4. & 5. Jos. l. Ant. 11. But no sooner did the Jewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritans and other idolatrous Nations adjoyning, gave all the impediment they could. So did the Governours of those Provinces under Cyrus altogether countenance the disturbers, and in no sort favoured the Jewes, nor the labours nor purposes they had in hand. And not onely

1 Esd. 2. 16. those which were but Provinciall Lieutenants, and other officers of lesse place, but Cambyses himself; who having the charge of the whole Empire, while Cyrus was busied otherwise, countermanded the building begun. And whereas some Authors make doubt,

Esd. 2. 16. that whatsoever Cambyses did when himself had obtained the Empire, yet during the 1 Esd. 5. 33. 1 Esd. 4. 5. life of Cyrus there was no such impediment or prohibition: they may herein resolve themselves out of Esdras, That by the conspiracies of the neighbouring Nations, the building was hindered all the time of King Cyrus life, &c. And therefore it is true, that the Jewes themselves affirm, as it is written in the second of John, That the Temple was 46. years in setting up, having received so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius.

And if we seek the naturall and politique courses which moved Cambyses to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he governed under him, as when himself became sole and and ſoveraign Monarch, we ſhall find them in that Epiſtle remembred by Eſdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the reſt, Preſidents and Counſellors in Phœnicia, wherein they complain that the Jewes were evermore rebellious and troublers of Kings; that their City being once built, they would then refuſe to pay tribute, and fall from the obedience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings. Eſdr. 1. c. 4.

But that which for that preſent ſeemed the moſt forcible impediment, was, that Cambyſes having it in his reſolution to invade Egypt, and that it was a common opinion, That the Jewes were deſcended of thoſe Nations, becauſe they iſſued thence under Moſes, when they conquered Judea, their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might return to their old vomit, and give the ſame diſturbance to Cambyſes Conqueſt, which they did to Sennacherib, Nabuchodonoſor, and other Kings of Babylon. For as it is written in Ezechiel, Egypt was the confidence of the houſe of Iſrael. Ezech. c. 29.

But it is to be underſtood, as Codoman and others have obſerved, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counſellors and Governors of Phœnicia complained againſt the Jewes, did not precede, but ſucceed Darius Hiſtaſpes, as in the ſixth and ſeventh chapters of Eſdras it is made plain: and alſo that thoſe Governors (whoſe Epiſtle ſheweth as much) did not withſtand the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and encloſing of the City, as by the reaſons given in the ſaid Epiſtle, and by the Kings anſwer, it is evident.

Alſo in the ſixt of Ezra, the fourteenth verſe, the kings are named in order as they governed, and Artaxerxes written after Darius; as: And they built and finiſhed it (to wit the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Iſrael, and by the commandement of Cyrus and Darius, and Artahſhaſte Kings of Perſia. Laſtly, in the ſeventh of Ezra it is written; Now after theſe things, in the reign of Artahſhaſte King of Perſia: which was as much as to ſay, after the finiſhing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the ſecond of Eſdras is there named by anticipation, not in his own time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citie and Temple of Hieruſalem. Which action though proſpered by the hand of God, was very ſlowly purſued by the men whom it moſt concerned, but firſt ſet on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire unto his eldeſt ſon Cambyſes, appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his yonger ſon to be Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Caduſia; and then died, after he had reigned (ſaith Herodotus) one and thirty yeats, or (according to Juſtine) but thirty.

§. VIII.

Of Cyrus his iſſue, and whether Atoſſa were his daughter, or (as ſome think) were the ſame with Queen Heſter.

CYrus had iſſue two ſons, Cambyſes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atoſſa, Meroe, and Artyſtona: Cteſias addeth to theſe, Amytis. Atoſſa and Meroe their brother Cambyſes married; Artyſtona, Darius Hyſtaſpes obtained; ſo did hee Atoſſa, Cambyſes being dead: who (as ſome Writers have ſuppoſed) inflamed both her husbands, Darius, and Xerxes after him, to invade Greece, to bee avenged of the whole Nation for the cruel intent that Aman (whom the old Tranſlation calleth a Macadonian) had againſt the Jewes, though the opinion of Joſephus be more probable, who finds Aman to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to be underſtood, how Atoſſa, the daughter of Cyrus, ſhould have been Eſther, whoſe Hiſtory ſeemes rather to appertain to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the ſon of Hyſtaſpes, or of Xerxes. The deſire of Atoſſa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Perſia, was partly grounded upon the honour which thereby ſhe thought her husband might obtaine, partly upon a feminine humour of getting many brave Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to bee her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give aſſent to the opinion of Codoman, who upon the neer ſound of the two names, Atoſſa and Hadaſſa, (by the latter of which Eſther was alſo called) makes them to have been one perſon. For though it bee true that Eſther concerning her parentage, a while might bee taken for a great Lady; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that ſhe ſhould therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare unto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certain it is, that Esther did at length discover her Kindred and Nation; whereby, if Histories could be kept free from this errour, yet the people, and especially the Nobility, must needs have understood the truth: who nevertheless did so well know the parentage of Atossa, that for her sake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her son Xerxes was perferred to the kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could have pretended a very weak claim. But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

CHAP. IV.

The estate of things from the death of CYRUS to the reign of DARIUS.

§. I.

Of the number and names of the Persian Kings.

IF the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbred the Persian Kings, and their times as followeth.

Darius Medus, and Cyrus joyntly.	2	years.
Cyrus alone.	22
Priscus Artaxerxes.	20
Darius Longimanus.	37
Darius Nothus.	19
Ataxerxes Mnemon.	55
Artaxerxes Ochus.	26
Arses, or Arsames.	4
Darius the last, conquered by Alexander.	6

To which Philo agreeth; which number of years added, make in all an hundred ninetie and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Cambyses and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assuerus for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (saith Melancton) of Darius the son of Hystaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melancton conjectureth, doth not account Cambyses in the Catalogue, because his reign was confounded with that of Cyrus.

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of Sedar Olam, who finds but foure Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus have also a differing account from the Greekes; whom nevertheless Eusebius and most of the Latines follow, and so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and, as I take it, refuted all the former Authors varying from that account. For in this sort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their reigns.

Chron. Kren. fo. 135

Melancton gives Cyrus but 29.	Cyrus in all.	30
	Cambyses with the Magi.	8
	Darius Hystaspes.	36
Melanct. but 20	Xerxes.	21
	Artaxerxes Longimanus.	40
	Darius Nothus.	19
Melanct. but 40.	Artaxerxes Mnemon.	43
Melanct. 26.	Artaxerxes Ochus.	23
	Arsames.	3
Melanct. 4.	Darius the last.	6

Which numbers put together, make in all two hundred and thirty.

This account (as I have ſaid) the moſt Chronologers, and the beſt learned approve. Theſe Perſian Princes, being all warranted by the authority of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his hiſtoricall Animadverſions hath gathered the places; finding firſt Cyrus in the ſecond of Chronicles, ch. 36. ver. 22, 23. Ezra. 1. ch. 1. ver. 1. and often elſewhere.

Secondly, Cambyſes in the eleventh of Daniel, who may indeed be well eſteemed for one of thoſe three Kings in the ſecond verſe named, and ſo the marginall Commentator upon the Geneva underſtands that place; but, under correction, miſtakes the matter greatly, when he ſaith in the ſame note, that Darius Hyſtapes was an enemy to the people of God, and ſtood againſt them: his great favour and liberality to the Jews being elſewhere proved.

Thirdly, is Darius Hyſtapes found in Ezra the firſt, c. 4. v. 5. who in the ſixt verſe is alſo named Ahaſſuerus.

Fourthly, in the eleventh of Daniel verſe the ſecond, Xerxes is plainly foretold and deſcribed, and the great War which he ſhould make againſt the Greeks by Daniel remembred.

Fifely, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezra the fourth, verſe ſeven, who is alſo called Arthaſaſta, c. 4. l. 1. Ezr. v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixtly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. verſe 24. and cap. 5. verſe 6. Nehem. cap. 12. verſe 22.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Mnemon in Nehem. c. 2. v. 1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arſames (for Darius the laſt, he was of another Family, the Line of Cyrus the Great ending in Ochus, who deſcended from Xerxes the ſon of Atoſſa, Cyrus his daughter; and the iſſue male of Cyrus failing with his own ſons.

But to proceed, Euſebius with the Latines, following the Greeks, apply the beginnings and ends of every Perſian King with their Acts, to ſome certain Olympiad; As the War of Aſtyages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Craſus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus reign to the beginning of the five and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The invaſion of Egypt by Cambyſes to the third year of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and ſo of the reſt. Which reference with good agreement between ſeverall forms of computation, adde the more credit unto both.

Again, this hiſtoricall demonſtration is confirmed by the Aſtronomicall computation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. of November, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the four hundred and four and twentieth year after Nabonaſſar. And the Æra of Nabonaſſar began on the ſix and twentieth of February: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Month of the firſt year of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accounts of the Olympiads, as doe the Greek Hiſtorians, or that of Nabonaſſar with Ptolomie, we ſhall find every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation. Ptol. in Alm. l. 3. cap. 8.

For Ptolomy reckons the time anſwerable to two hundred and four and twenty Julian years, and an hundred and forty days from Nabonaſſar to the ſixteenth of July in the ſeventh year of Cambyſes.

The Greeks, and namely, Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Egypt by Cambyſes in the ſecond or third year of the threeſcore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyſes ſeventh year, in the firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad: which firſt of the threeſcore and fourth Olympiad runs along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonaſſar. The like agreement is conſequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewiſe the twentieth of Darius, who ſucceeded Cambyſes, is according to Ptolomie the two hundred and ſix and fortieth of Nabonaſſar, which (obſerving the differences of Nabonaſſars Æra and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twenty years) agrees with the third of the threeſcore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greeks. In this Joſephus agrees with the Greeks throughout, ſaving that he joyneth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus in the deſtruction of Babylon; which is true, and not contrary to the Greek computation, but may very well ſtand with it.

Laſtly, the diſagreements and confuſed accompts of thoſe that follow the other Catalogue of the Perſian kings formerly rehearſed, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greeks, which being constant in it self, accordeth also with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

§. II.

Of Cambyses, and the conquering of Egypt by him.

WEe will therefore according to the truth give the Empire of Persia to Cambyses, the son of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, saving the desire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof he was possest in his Fathers time while Cyrus made war in the North. Ctesias with others give him a longer reign than agreeth with the Grecian accompt before received.

Lib. 2. c. 2. Her. l. 3. pag. 83, 84, 85.

In the fift year of his sole reign, and in the third year of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodore and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrown the King thereof, Psammeniticus, he not only caused him to be slain; but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias give for cause of this war (being no other indeed than the Ambition of Cambyses) that when he sent to Amasis King of Egypt, to have his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessor, which Cambyses disdained.

Howsoever it were; true it is, that Cambyses gathered an Armie fit for such an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Egypt, Amasis died, and left Psammeniticus, whom Ctesias called Amyrteus, his successor; who enjoyed Egypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but six Months, though other Chronologers give him six years.

But how long soever he held the Crown, in one battell he lost it, and was himself taken prisoner.

It is said that Cambyses, following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that he also trusted him with the government of Egypt, and that upon some revolt, or suspicion thereof, he caused him to be slaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if we may beleeve Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a son called Inarus, who caused the Egyptians to revolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Psammeniticus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyses, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amasis the King of Egypt, who died before his arrivall, that he caused his body to be drawn out of the grave, and after divers indignities used, commanded the same to be burnt, contrary to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Egyptians used to powder their dead bodies with salt, and other drugs, to the end the worms might not devoure them. The * Persians durst not consume them with fire, which they esteemed as a God, and therefore feared to feed it with Carrion.

* Neither did the Romans ever consume their dead to ashes, till the time of Sylla Dictator, who caused his own to be devoured by that element, fearing the Law called Talionis, or like for like, because himself had untombed the carkasse of Caius Marius after his death Her. l. 3. Plin. l. 6. c. 54. Stra. & Just. l. 1. Pag. 87. 88. Her. l. 3. Sen. l. 7

§. III.

The rest of Cambyses his Acts.

AFter this victory obtained in Egypt, Cambyses sent an Army into Cyprus, and constrained Evelthon King thereof to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Egyptians.

While Cambyses yet busied himself in Egypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the images themselves, with the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to be torn down and defaced. This done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to overturne the Temple of Jupiter Ammon; but the Devill in defence of his Oratorie raised such a Tempest of Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Country is covered, as the Persians were therewith choked and over-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misadventure, Herodotus and Seneca report, that disdaining to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Army, which himself meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-sent troup had tryed, he changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the elements doe not obey them, according to that old English proverb, Go, saith the King; Stay, saith the Tide.

After

After his return from the attempt of Æthiopia, he caused Apis the Egyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slain: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeal, and been executed as in service of him that onely is, and liveth. But soon afterwards, when in a dream it seemed unto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) he gave it in charge to his favorite Praxaspes, to murther Smerdis his brother. And having married his own sisters, contrary to the Persian Lawes, he committed a most causeless and most detestable murder upon the one of them called Meroe, then by himself with child, because she bewailed the death of her brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Cambyses, That because his Predecessors observed religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Judges, and enquired of them whether there were any Law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marry his own sister; it being his own intent so to doe: The Judges (who had alwayes either lawes or in distinctions store to satisfie Kings and times) made answer, That there was not any thing written allowing any such conjunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was alwayes left to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselves; and so as Nauclerus termes it, invenerunt occasionem: That is as much to say, as the Judges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it concerned not the Kings private satisfaction, he caused Sisamnus one of his Judges, and perchance one of those which favoured his incestuous match, to by flayed alive, for an unjust judgement given, and the same his hide to be hung up over the judgement seat. After which, bestowing the fathers office on his son, he willed him to remember that the same partiality deserved the same punishment. Her. p. 89. 90.

Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the son of his beloved Praxaspes was very strange and ungrateful. For when he desired to be truly informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; onely it was by many observed, that he took more than usuall delight in the tast of Wine: With which taxation inflamed, he used this replication; And are the Persians double-tongued, who also tell me that I have in all things excelled my father Cyrus? Thou Praxaspes shalt then witnesse, whether in this report they have done me right: for if at the first shot I pierce thy sons heart with an arrow, then is it false that hath been spoken; but if I misse the mark, I am then pleased that the fame be accounted true, and my subjects believed. This being spoken, he immediatly directed an arrow towards the innocent child, who falling down dead with the stroke, Cambyses commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous Tyrant greatly rejoycing, shewed it to the Father, with this saying in stead of an Epitaph: Now Praxaspes, thou maist resolve thy selfe, that I have not lost my wits with Wine, but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties he exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de soy. For when he was informed that Patizites, and Smerdis the Magi (Cedrenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdius) Ministers of his domesticall affairs, taking advantage of the great resemblance between Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possest themselves of the Empire, he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horseback, his sword dis-sheathing, pierced his own thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an over-late and remedilesse repentance of the slaughter which he had executed upon his own brother, he soon after gave up his wicked ghost, when he had reigned eight years, accounting therein those seven Moneths in which the Magi governed, while he was absent.

In Cambyses the Male Line of Cyrus failed. For he had no issue either by Atossa or Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome gives him a daughter called Pantaptes, and a son called Orontes, who being drowned in the river Ophites by Antioch, the same was afterward in memory of the Princes death called Orontes. Zon. Com. 2. p. 117.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Egypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly seated, and that of Meroe in the Island of Nilus, calling it by the name of his sister Meroe.

§. IIII.

Of the inter-regnum between Cambyſes and Darius.

CYrus and his two ſons being now dead, and the Kingdome in the poſſeſſion of one of the Magi, the counterfeit of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provincial Governors of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabyſus, Aſphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all deſcended from Achamenes the firſt Perſian King) having diſcovered the fraud of this impoſture, joyned their forces together, ſurpriſed and rooted out the Conſpirator with his Companions and Aſſiſtants. In which action (ſaith Juſtine) Intaphernes and Aſphatines were ſlain; but Herodotus otherwiſe, that they were onely wounded; for he avoweth that all the ſeven Princes were preſent at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Governour, theſe Princes grew into a conſultation how the ſame might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the ſeven did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities ſhould confederate, and by juſt lawes defend their liberty in equality, giving divers reaſons for his opinion, being as it ſeemed greatly terrefied by the cruelties of Cambyſes; As firſt, that it was not ſafe to give all power to any one, ſeeing greatneſſe it ſelf, even in good men, doth often infect the mind with many vices, and the liberty and freedome in all things is moſt apt to inſult, and to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Again, that tyrants do commonly uſe the ſervice of wicked men, and favour them moſt; they uſurp upon the lawes of their Country; take other mens wives by force, and deſtroy whom they pleaſe without judgement.

Megabyſus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intolerable than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without judgement, runne into buſineſſe and affairs with precipitation, like raging and overbearing flouds.

He therefore thought it ſafeſt to make election of a few, and thoſe of the beſt, wiſeſt, and moſt vertuous; becauſe it is ever found, that excellent Counſels are ever had from excellent men.

Darius gave the third judgement, who perſwaded the creation of a King, becauſe even among few diuturnity of concord is ſeldome found, and in great Empires it doth ever happen that the diſcord of many Rulers hath enforc'd the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, ſaith Darius, far ſafer to obſerve the lawes of our Country, by which Kingly government hath been ordained.

The other four Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the ſame Imperiall govenment by God eſtabliſhed, and made proſperous. And to avoyd partiality, it was accorded, that the morning following theſe ſeven Princes ſhould mount on Horſeback, and on him the kingdome ſhould be conferred, whoſe Horſe after the Sun-riſing ſhould firſt ney or bray. In the evening after this appointment was made, it is ſaid that Darius conſulted with the Maſter of his Horſe Oebarus, who in the Suburbs of the City where the election was reſolved of, cauſed the ſame Horſe, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to cover a Mare, who as ſoon as he came into the ſame place, was the firſt Horſe that brayed. Whereupon the other ſix Princes deſcended from their Horſes, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Herl. 3. pag. 100, 101.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memory of the ſeven Princes, whereof Darius himſelf was one, that delivered the Empire from the uſurpation of the Magi, he divided the whole into ſeven governments; Herodotus ſaith, into twenty Satrapies.

Of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes.

§. I.

Of Darius his Linage.

Darius was descended of the antient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achemenida, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall successor. For in this sort Herodotus derives him as before;

Cyrus the first, who had Teispius, who begat Ariaramnes, who was father of Arsamnes, the father of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, surnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes. Curt. l. 4.

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great, in the wars against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made jealous of Darius by a dream of his own, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was delivered, and made Governour of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyses into Egypt; he then joyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neying of his horse, or, as others affirm, by strong hand he obtained the Empire, which he the more assured to himself by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Neeces for his wives. Her. l. 1. & 3.

Hystaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius, these three sons, who were great Commanders in the war which Darius made in Asia the lesse, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artahernes, and Artabanus, who disswaded Xerxes from the second Grecian warre. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobryas the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Army of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Artosostre his Cosen germane.

Reineccius gives to Hystaspes five sons, Darius who succeeded Cambyses, Artabanus, Ariaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

§. II.

Of Darius his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

Darius devised equall lawes whereby his subjects might be governed, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gave accesse to all his subjects, and behaved himself so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassals: Only he layd divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not been accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of fourteen thousand five hundred and threscore talents, saith Herodotus.

The war which Cambyses made a far off in Egypt, and the contention between the Magi and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gave heart to the Babylonians to recover their liberty, and to shake off the Persian yoke; whereof Darius being advertised, he prepared an Army to recover that City and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult work, he used the service of Zopirus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his own Ears and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to fly to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who for having given him advice to give over the siege of their City, had in this sort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gave him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition and commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable over-throwes given to the Persians upon sallies, he delivered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twenty moneths. Her. l. 3.

of Darius his favour to the Jewes in building the Temple.

IN the second year of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same should be finished at his own charge, and out of the revenues of the Crown. And whereas the Governours of those Provinces which are situate between Euphrates and the Phœnician, and midland Sea (whom Ezra calleth the Captains beyond the River) had hindred the work in Cambyses his time, Darius gave commandement that they should not thence-forth come neer unto Jerusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should withdraw themselves, and get them far off till all were finished, and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab illis, With-draw your selves far from them; In our English, Be ye far from thence, to wit, from the City and Temple now in building.

Ezra. c. 6.

He also made a decree which concerned his own Subjects, That whosoever should thenceforth hinder the setting up of the Temple of God, that his house should be torn down, and the disturber hanged on the Gallowes made of the timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh invocation to God, That hath caused his Name to dwell there (to) destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and to destroy this house of God which is in Jerusalem, &c. In four years after which decree (the Jewes being really furnished with money and all things necessary from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth year of Darius Hystaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first return.

of Darius his Scythian Warre.

AFter the recovery of Babylon he invaded the Scythians, whose King Justine calleth Lanthinus, and saith, that Darius undertook this warre against him, because he refused him his daughter in marriage. The better to convoy his Army into Scythia, he built a bridge of small Vessels over the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custody of the same in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians and Æolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Grecians to break down the bridge, to the end Darius might not return thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficulty; but the same was resisted by Histiæus Prince of Milet, a Citie of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greeks, Diodorus calleth Traytors to their Countrey, because they joyned themselves to Darius. But the Scythians more elegantly termed them good slaves, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were presented with as fair an occasion of liberty as could have been desired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the desart Countrey called Bessarabia, found in it neither people to resist them, nor any sustenance to relieve them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, using the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Graziers, driving their Heards from one place to another, as opportunity of Pasture led them. Standing Towns they had none, but used for Houses the Waggons wherein they carried their wives and children. These Waggons they place at every Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Town, removeable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himself, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such as Agora, (as they name it) or Town of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himself, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither wayes to direct him, victuals to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or living creatures, not any thing at all, which either he himself might make use of, or by destroying it might grieve his enemies, he began to perceive his own folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet letting a good face upon a bad game, he sent brave messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his flight, and either to make triall of his valour and fortune in plain battell; Or, if he acknowledged himself the weaker, then to yeeld by fair means, and become his Subject, giving him Earth and Water, which the Persians used to demand as a sign that all was yeelded unto them. To this challenge the Scythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answer, sending a Bird, a Frog a Mouse, and five Arrows: which dumb shew Darius interpreting by his own wish, thought that he did yeeld all the Elements wherein those creatures live, and his weapons withall into his hands. But Gobryas, one of the seven Princes, who had slain the Magi, construed their meaning aright, which was thus, O ye Persians, get ye wings like Birds, or dive under the water, or creep into holes in the earth, for else ye shall not escape our arrows. And this interpretation was soon verified by the Scythians themselves, who assailed the Persian camp, drave the horsemen into the trenches, and vexed the Armie with continuall Alarums day and night; were so fearlesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and even in his sight, they did not forbear the pastime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of theirs, Darius was so discouraged, that he forsook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were sick and weak behind him, and so with all speed marched away towards the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians, who mist him; yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, assuring them that the Persian king should never more be able to do them either good or harm. Which words had certainly been proved true, had not Hystiaus the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the comming of Darius, whom the Scythians did likewise fail to meet, when they returned from Ister to seek him out.

§. V.

Darius having thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which War he employed Megabasus, who mastered the Paonians, and transplanted them, and possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, Byzantium, and other places, being also soon after subjected, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the son of Syssamnes, whom Cambyses had excoriated for false judgement. So were the Cities of * Selybria, and [a] Cardia likewise taken in from the Persian, who having now reduced under his obeysance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadors to Amintas King of Macedon adjoyning, demanding of him by the Earth and Water, the Soveraignty over that kingdome. Amintas doubting his own strength, entertained the Embassadors with gentle words, and afterwards invited them to a solemne and magnificent feast; the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might be present: which being granted, the Embassadors, who were well filled with wine, and presumed upon their greatnesse and many victories, began to use such embracings, and other lascivious behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexander the Kings son, great Grandfather to Alexander the Great, disdaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to with-draw himself from the assembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embassadors, whom withall he entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promising their speedy return. This being obtained, Alexander caused the like number of well-favoured yong men to clothe themselves in the same garments, and to use the same attires which the Ladies had worn at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long knives, of which they were provided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soon after given by Darius for a severe revenge of this murder. But Alexander somewhat before the death of Amintas, gave his sister Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principall Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would prove for the invasion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexander escaped that tempest, which threatned to fall upon him very suddenly; the war of Asia the lesse, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

§. VI.

The first occasion of the War which Darius made upon Greece, with a rehearsall of the government in Athens, whence the quarrell grew.

NOw the better to understand the reason and motives of that great War, which followed soon after, between the Persians and Grecians, it is necessary to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citie endured the hardest and worst brunt of Darius invasion on that side the Sea, with admirable successe. Neither doe I hold it any impertinency to be large in unfolding every circumstance of so great a businesse as gave fire to those wars, which never could be throughly quenched, untill in the ruin of this great Persian Monarchy, Persepolis the capitall City of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull, as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians hath raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former books it may be gathered, how Athens and other parts of Greece, were anciently governed, the same being already set down, though scatteringly, and in severall times, among other the Contemporary occurrents of the Eastern Emperors, and the Kings of Judea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember again the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedæmonians, they maintained still their ancient policy under Kings, though these also after some fifteen descents were bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians, in the former books remembred, who willingly died for the safety of his people, was therefore so honoured by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former government from Monarchicall to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the Son of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontidæ; and of these there were twelve Generations besides Medon, to wit, Agestus.

Archippus, in whose times the Greeks transported themselves into Ionia, after Troy an hundred and fourscore years, accorcording to Eusebius: which migration all other Cronologers (such as follow Eusebius herein excepted) find in the year after Troy fallen one hundred and forty.

Agamnestor.
Æschylus, in whose time the Ephori (according to Eusebius) were erected in Lacedæmon.
Alcamenon, the last Prince for life, after whose death the Athenians elected Decenniall Governours: the former Princes for life having continued in all three hundred and sixteen years. The first of those that governed for ten years, or the first Archon, was Charops, then Æsymedes.
Elydicus.
Hippomenes.
Leocrates.
Apsander.
Erixias was the last Archon of the decinnal Governours, which form continuing threescore and ten years, was then changed into annuall Magistrates, Maiors, or Burg-masters, of which Theseus was the first, according to Pausanias: others find Leostratus; and then Paus. pag. 159. Diony. l. 3. Paus. p. 169. Paus. 170. Pag. 331.

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdome, gave Laws to the Athenians, which were published, according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth year of Tarquinius Priscus, and were in after ages derived unto the Romanes, and by the Decem-viri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into Twelve Tables, which were the ground of the Romane laws. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his own days violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed unto the practice practice and maintenance of a popular government; the state of Athens was very soon changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus, two Citizens of noble Families, were become the heads, took occasion by their contention and insolency to raise a third faction more powerfull than the other two, and more plausible, for that he seemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Having by this meanes obtained love and credit, he wounded himself, and feigned that by malice of his enemies he had like to have been slain for his love to the good Citizens; he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadell of Athens, he made himself Lord of the town; Hegesistratus being then Governor. But the Citizens, who in every change of government had sought to remove themselves further and further from the form of a Monarchie, could so ill brook this usurpation of Pisistratus, that he was driven for lack of help, to fly the town, as soon as Megacles and Lycurgus (joyning their forces) attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny, founded upon the dissention of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soon after well reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megacles found the power of Lycurgus to grow greater than his own, he did (as is the usuall practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemy Pisistratus, to whom he gave his Daughter in marriage; by which alliance the Family of the Alcmæonida, whereof Megacles was chief, became very powerfull, yet so, that Pisistratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alcmæonida, and especially Megacles being incensed against Pisistratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife, Wherefore they practised with the Souldiers of the Town, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pisistratus upon the first discovery of their intent, perceived no other remedy for his affaires, than to with-draw himself to Eretria, where he remained eleven years. Which time being expired, having hired Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, he againe recovered the principality of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, he governed Athens seventeen years, according to Aristotle, and reigned in all thirty and three years, saith Elianus, but as Justine hath it, four and thirty, accounting the time belike as well before as after his severall expulsions. Herodotus gives the Father and the Son six and thirty years; Aristotle five and thirty. But Thucidides affirmeth, that he died very old, leaving for his Successors, his two Sons, Hippias and Hipparchus, who governed the Athenians with such moderation, as they rather seemed the Lineall successors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, & some three years before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparchus was murdered by Harmodius and Aristogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucidides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with unnaturall lust, after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that he was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers, & authors of that scandall. Hippias fearing that this enterprise upon his brother had more and deeper roots than were apparent, first sought to discover the further intents of Harmodius and Aristogiton, by a Harlot of theirs called Lamia: who because she would not reveale her Companions, did cut out her own tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himself, enter into a strait amity with Æantides, Tyrant of the City Lampsacus, whom he knew to be greatly favoured by Darius, to whose son Hypoclus he gave one of his Daughters in marriage. But some three years after the death of his brother; doubting I know not what strong practice against himself, he began to use the Citizens with great severity, which neither Pisistratus the Father, nor Hippias himself had ever exercised, during their usurpation till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred up Clistines one of the noblest and best able of their City, to practise their delivery: who calling to his assistance the banished Alcmanida, together with an Army of the Lacedæmonians led by Cleomenes their King, so affrighted Hippias, as by composition he gave over his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarking himself, took land at * Sigeum, whence he went to Lampsacus in Mysia governed by Æantides, who presented him to Darius. He was deprived of his estate, as Herodotus and Thucidides agree, twenty years before the battell of Marathon: all which time he continued, partly with Æantides, at other times with Artaphernes Lieutenant for Darius, Thus farre I have digreſſed from Darius, to the end the Reader may conceive the better the cauſes and motives of this warre: whereof the hope that Hippias had to be reſtored to Athens by the help of Darius, which made him ſolicite and perſwade the Perſians to conquer Greece, was one, but not the moſt urgent.

Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cauſe of the wars enſuing between Greece and Perſia.

ANother, and a ſtrong motive to this expedition, was the Ionick war, breaking out in Aſia about the ſame time. The Colonies tranſported out of Greece into Aſia, which occupied the greateſt part of the Sea-coaſt, having enjoyed their liberty about 500. years, even from the Ionick migration, to the time of Craeſus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by Cyrus, and left as hereditary Servants to the Crown of Perſia.

But as it is the cuſtome of Nations half conquered (witneſſe Ireland) to rebel again upon every advantage and opportunity: ſo did the Ionians, and other Greecians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, ſeek by all meanes poſſible to free themſelves.

At this time they found ſuch men ready to ſpurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Perſian been given unto them for bridles to hold them in ſubjection. Every one of thoſe Towns had a Lord to rule it, whom they (abhorring the government of one man) called their Tyrants. Theſe Lords were very true to the Perſian, by whoſe onely might they held the people in ſubjection. And this their dutifull affection they had well declared, when, Darius being in great extremity, they uſed all meanes to deliver him and his Armie (that otherwiſe had been loſt) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of ſervice Hiſtiaus the tyrant of Miletus expected the chief thanks, as having been chief Author of their expecting Darius, when the reſt, either perſwaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their own deſires, were ready to have abandoned him. But it came ſo to paſſe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harm that Hiſtiaus (being powerfull and crafty) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had already received at his hand, found meanes to carry him along to Suſa, where he detained him with all kind uſage of a friend, yet kept ſuch good eſpiall upon him, as an enemy, he could not ſtart away. Hiſtiaus had ſubtilty enough to diſcover the kings purpoſe, which ill agreed with his own deſires. For he thought it more pleaſant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citie, having a ſmall Territory, than to ſit and feaſt at the great Kings table, and hear the counſels by which a large Empire was managed, being himſelf an idle beholder, and enjoying with much reſtraint of liberty, none other pleaſures than a private man might beſtow upon himſelf.

Wherefore he bethought himſelf of raiſing of ſome tumults in the lower Aſia, to pacifie which, if he might be ſent, as one that had great experience and authority in thoſe quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to ſtay at home, and either ſatisfie the King with excuſes, or deal as occaſion ſhall require. Reſolving upon this courſe, he ſent very ſecret inſtructions to Ariſtagoras his kinſman, whom he had left his Deputy at Miletus, adviſing him to ſtirre up ſome Rebellion. Theſe directions came ſeaſonably to Ariſtagoras, who having failed in an enterpriſe upon the Iſle of Naxos, through the falſe dealing of a Perſian his Aſſociate, ſtood in fear of diſgrace, if not of ſome further ill that might befall him, as one that had waſted the Kings treaſures to no good purpoſe.

Therfore he readily embraced the counſell: and the better to draw the whole Country of Ionia into the ſame courſe which he determined to run, he abandoned his tyranny, and did ſet Miletus at liberty. This plauſible beginning wan unto him the hearts of the Mileſians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom ſome he took and ſold as ſlaves to their Citizens, others he chaſed away) cauſed the whole Nation to be at his command. The Perſian Fleet, whereof he lately had been Admirall in the enterpriſe of Naxos, he had ſurpriſed in his firſt breaking out, together with the principall Officers, Officers and Captains, so that now he thought himself able to deal with the great King's forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be upon his neck, and crush both him and his assistants to pieces, unlesse he were able to raise an Armie that might hold the field; which the Ionians alone were insufficient to perform. Therefore he took a journey to Sparta, where having assayed in vain with many arguments, and the offer of fiftie Talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedemonians: he went from thence to Athens, and with better successe besought the people to lend him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadours which had been sent to the Persian King's Lieutenant in the lower Asia, desiring them not to give countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answers, having found very churlish entertainment. So that the evill which they were to expect in all likelihood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Ionians, and the perswasions of Aristagoras, drew them on a pace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twenty ships the Athenians furnished for this voyage; to which the Eretrians furnished five more, in regard of the ancient kindnesse that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their own forces joyned, the Ionians entred the River Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephesus: by which advantage they surprised Sardis when no enemy was heard of or suspected; insomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of safetie, than by retraiting himself into the Castle, which the Gretians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughters of the Citizens, and the Citie flaming.

The Persians, at length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence; and recovered the Market place, strengthened by the river Pactolus, which ran through it, and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well advising themselves, made all the haste they could toward the sea side. But Artaphernes having gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Gretians, and found them neer Ephesus, where setting resolvedly upon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Armie, the rest saving themselves in Ephesus. In this fight Evalcidas, Captain of the Eretrians perished: but his fame and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonides preserved. After this overthrow, the Athenians, which were before sent unto Aristagoras and to the Ionians, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their tears, be perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noise in the world, than the late good successe which the Persians had in one or two skirmishes, could raise. Wherefore the Ionians bravely proceeded, won a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into the Hellespont, got Byzantium and other Towns into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, began hereupon to take heart; and entring into confederacie with the Ionians, who were able to give them aide by Sea, rebelled against the Persians.

These newes comming to the ear of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatred of the Athenians, upon whom he vowed to take sharp revenge. As for the Ionians, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to think, that they would not have dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom the ignorance of his great might had afforded the courage to provoke him. This was the main ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which the solicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gave onely some form and assistance: the businesse, when once it was thus far on foot, being like enough to have proceeded, though he had perished ere it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greeks; for all of them gave to his Rebels free harbour: the Ilanders moreover did help to furnish out a Navie of three hundred and sixty sail against him. These provocations did rather breed in him a desire to abate their pride, than any fear of harm that they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprize. In every fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captains. In one Sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the upper hand; but they were Phœnicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished: neither was that victorie of any use to them; the Cyprians, in whose aide they came, being utterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and fair force overthrown the Carians in two battels, and reclamed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Towns upon Hellespont, with some Æolian and Ionian Cities, when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himself in Amphipolis, a Colonie of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike he landed, overthrew him, and cut his troups in pieces.

About the same time, Histiæus, the first mover of this insurrection, came down into those quarters; who having undertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whom his double dealing was detected.

But this evasion preserved him not long. And after many vain attempts that he made, he was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him upon remembrance of old good turns; as it seems that he would have done, by the buriall which he commanded to be given to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heavie taking of his death.

Histiæus had sought to put himself into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his conditions, chose rather to keep him out, and make shift for themselves, without his help. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time withstood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet, which promised unto them the liberty of an open Sea, emboldened them to trie the uttermost, when very few friends were left upon that Continent to take their part. But their Navie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels forsaking them upon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse flight of those that should have assisted them. Neither was it long before the Town it self, being assaulted both by Land and Sea, was taken by force, the Citizens slain, their wives and children made slaves, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whom for six years space they had put to so much trouble.

§. VIII.

The warre which Darius made upon Greece, with the battell of Marathon, and Darius his death.

THis Warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe; Darius obstinate in the enterprise and Conquest of Greece (though at first hee pretended to make the Warre but against the Athenians and Eritreans, who joyntly assisted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydia) did now by his Embassadours demand an acknowledgement from them all: among whom, some of them not so well resolved as the rest, submitted themselves; as the Æginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed, (by the assistance of the Lacedæmonians) after divers encounters forc'd them to give pledges, and to relinquish the partie of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedæmonians in this warre, and caused his companion-King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fled to Darius, farre the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civill warres among the Greekes. He therefore gave order to Hippagoras to prepare a Fleet of ships fit to transport his Armie over the Hellespont: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. The charge in chief of his Armie he committed to Datis, accompanied and assisted by Hippias, the son of Pisistratus, expelled out of Athens twentie years before, and by Artaphernes his brother, Governour of Sardis, and the Sea-coast of Asia the lesse. These Commanders having their Companies brought down to the Sea-side, imbarked

Herod. l. 6. Whether this City or People were of Peloponnesus in Sicyonia, or of Ægæa, between Thessalia and Macedon, I do not know: but those borderers, and next the enemy, were more likely to compound than the rest far off. There is also a City called Æginum, not far from Ægæa, Livie, 32, 33, &c.

imbarked themselves in six hundred Gallies and other Vessels, and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way between Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Ægean Sea, but on the contrary they might alwaies both relieve themselves in their passage, and shroud themselves from all sudden tempests and out-rage.

To this end they first possest themselves of Samos; secondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their own forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Darius did not only forbear to sack, but recalling the inhabitants, he gave order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice to Apollo erected. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubœa: for that Citie (as already hath been shewed) had assisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians took ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after six daies assault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphabus and Philagius, they took it, sackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus far the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayls. From Eubœa the Persians past their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where they landed, towards Athens. In Herod.

The Athenians finding the time arrived, wherein they were to dispute with their own vertues against Fortune, and to cast lots for their libertie, for their wives, their children, and their lives, put themselves in the best order they could to make resistance, and withall sent away with speed to the Lacedæmonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who passing through Arcadia, encountred in the way a familiar Devill, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to assure the Athenians of victorie, promising that some one of the gods should be present at the battell, to assist them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his return seeing he could not bring with him any present succours from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly availing to bring news from the gods, and promise of assistance from Heaven, which no doubt (though the device was somewhat likely to be his own, yet) it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have bin more stirred up with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solide reason.

The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand only of the Plateans (who having been formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremitie witnesse their thankfulnesse and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the walls of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of ten thousand Athenians, and one thousand of the Plateans. In the end, and after great diversitie of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the triall by battell, prevailed.

The Armies being now in view, and within a mile of each other, the Athenians disposed themselves into three troups: two wings or horns, as they terme them, and the bodie of a battell. The Persians when they perceived so small a troup advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather dispossest of their understandings, than possest with the resolution whereof they made shew. So invincible and resistlesse the Persians esteemed their own numbers to be, and that small troup of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victorie being doubtfully balanced for a while, sometime the vertue of the Grecians, and sometimes the number of the Persians prevailed, the Grecians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, these great forces of Darius were disordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie even to the Sea-shore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage, saved themselves in their ships.

The Persian Armie consisted of an hundred thousand foot and ten thousand horse; of which there were slain in the place six thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourscore and twelve. For howsoever it came to passe, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Panici terrores, or by some other affright, it seemeth that the invading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backs towards their enemy, and lost that number, by Herodotus set down, in their disorderly retrait, or rather in their flat running away. As for Justines report, That two hundred thousand of the Persian armie were slain, the same hath no appearance nor possibilitie of truth. In this fight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was slain, saith Justine and Cicero; but Suidas tels us, That he escaped, and died most miserably in Lemnos. Ad. Att.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast upon Miltiades, who both perswaded the triall by battell, and behaved himself therein answerably to the counsell which he gave. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Grecians, of mark and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesilaus. It is also said, That Cynegyrus following the Persians to their embarking, laid hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he yet offered to arrest it with his left; of which also being deprived, he took hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first year of the threescore and twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the war made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romans: Alexander the son of Amyntas being then King of Macedon, and Phanippus then Governour of Athens, according to Plutarch, or Hybilides, after Halycarnassaeus. In vita Arist.

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned back into the lesser Asia, Miltiades sought and obtained an imployment against the Ilanders of Paros, one of the Cyclades, and passing over his Companies in threescore and ten Gallies, after six and twentie days assault he brake his thigh, in seeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himself being made unable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those ungratefull Citizens forgetting all his services past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battell of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who envied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weak and wounded body being not able to endure the one, nor his estate to pay the other, he after a few days ended his life.

Which envie of the better sort to each other, with their private Factions, assisted by the unthankfull and witlesse people, brought them, not many years after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subjection and slaverie. Miltiades left behind him one son called Cymon begotten on Hegesipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (saith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to Themistocles in understanding, but exceeded them both in justice and good government.

Now Darius taking greater care how to recover his honour, than sorrow for the losse received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike provisions. But the Egyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the re-invasion of Greece. The dissention also among his sons, of whom the younger being born after he was king, and by so great a mother as Atossa, disdaining to give place to his elder brother, born before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affairs, gave end to all his consultations and enterprises, and joyned him to the earth of his ancestors, about a year after the battell of Marathon, and after that he had reigned six and thirty years. He left behind him five sons, namely, Artabasanes, born before he obtained the kingdom, Xerxes who succeeded him, Achaemenes Governour of Egypt, Masistes and Anabignes.

CHAP. VI.

Of Xerxes.

§. I.

The preparation of Xerxes against Greece.

XErxes received from his father, as hereditarie, a double Warre, one to be made against the Egyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Grecians, of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the consultation for the prosecution of this Warre, which was chiefely bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commanded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hystaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his sister Artozostres, perswaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and uncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrary counsell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late invasions, which Darius had made contrary to his counsell: The one in person upon the Scythians, the other by his Lieutenants upon the Greeks; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his Honour.

He therefore besought Xerxes to be right well advised before he did too far imbark himself in this businesse. For whatsoever undertaking hath deliberate and sound counsell for conductor, though the successe doe not alwaies answer the probability, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variableness of his own nature, which only the divine Providence, and not any humane power, can constrain.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xerxes in prosecution of his former intent, that Artabanus, whether terrefied by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which he made known to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion and counsell) assisted the Grecian Expedition with all the power he had.

After the war of Egypt was ended, four years were consumed in describing and gathering an Army for this invasion: which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeen hundred thousand foot, and eighty thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts of Carriage, if wee may believe Herodotus: for of this multitude, Trogus finds the number lesse by seven hundred thousand footmen. He l. 7.

The Commanders of the severall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commandements of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of their own Leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the son of Gobrias by a sister of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Xerxes his neerest kinred, as Generalls over all; saving that the charge of ten thousand select Persians, called the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died, or were slain, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eightie thousand horsemen were led by the sons of Datis, who commanded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were 2200. and eight, furnished by the Phœnicians, who had Commanders of their own Nation, and by the Cypriotes, Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Æolians, and Hellespontines, who were trusted with the furnishing of their own Vessels, though commanded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes, the son of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certain Gallies furnished by Artemesia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princesse of Halycarnassus, and the Ilands adjoyning, which her self commanded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himself was imbarked.

§. II.

Xerxes Armie entertained by Pythius: his cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent: his bridge of Boats over the Hellespont: and the discourse between him and Artabanus upon the view of the Armie.

WHen this world of an Armie was throughly furnished, he caused all the nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous, and repair at Sardis in Lydia. And when he had assembled to the number of seventeen hundred thousand foot, as he entred the body of Celænas, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Herds of Cattel gave food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The feast ended, he also presented him with two thousand Talents of silver, and in Gold four Millions, wanting seven thousand of the Persian Darici; which make so many of our Markes.

The King overcome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythius, did not only refuse his treasure offred, but commanded that seven thousand Darici should be given him to make up his four Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when hee made the present. But soon after, when Pythius besought him to spare one of his five sons from his attendance into Greece (because himself was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his own son) Xerxes most barbarously caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commanding that the one half of his carkasse should be layed on the right, and the other half on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea-side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the same (with the half Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountain and the Chersonesus or Neck of Land it self: a work of more ostentation than of use, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and a half) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough only for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so severed from the main, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thyssus and Cleona.

He also gave order, that a Bridge upon Boats should be made over the Hellespont between Abidus and Sestos, the Sea there having a mile of bredth, wanting an eighth part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torn asunder and dissevered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commanded those to be slain that were masters of the work, and caused six hundred threescore and fourteen Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industrie of the Phœnicians was so well anchored to resist both winds blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boorded and rayled, the whole Army of seventeen hundred thousand Foot, and fourscore thousand Horse, with all the Moyles and Carriages, past over it into Europe in seven dayes and seven nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Cæsar afterward use. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xerxes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought neer to the Sea-side, Xerxes took a view of all his Troupes, assembled in the Plains of Abidus, being carried up, and seated on a place over-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adjoyning: and after he had gloried in his own happinesse, to behold and command so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armie and Fleet, hee suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into tears, moved with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeats there should not any one survive of that marvellous multitude: the cause of which sudden change of passion when he uttered to Artabanus his Uncle; Artabanus spake to the King to this effect: That which is more lamentable than the dissolution of this great Troup within that number of years by the King remembred, is, That the life it self which we enjoy is yet more miserable than the end thereof: for in those few dayes given us in the world, there is no man among all these, or elsewhere, that ever found himself so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleased himself better with the desire and hope of death, than of living; the incident calamities, diseases, and sorrows whereto mankind is subject, being so many and inevitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appear unto us over-long; to avoid all which, there is neither refuge nor rest, but in desired death alone.

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to overcast those joyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding still a doubtfull conceit, that Artabanus utterly condemned the invasion of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, desired him to deal freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous; Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good successe? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he assured himself of the Kings resolution to goe on, and dared not by any new arguments to batter the great purpose it self, yet he told the King, That there were two things which marvellously affrighted him, and which the King should find, as he feared, to be most adverse; to wit, the Sea and the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of so great a Fleet; insomuch, as if any tempest should arise, all the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Havens thereof afford them any safety: and therefore when any such shelter shall be wanting unto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremitie, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemy, by how much the unsatiate desire of man to obtain more and more thereof, doth lead him forward: for were there no man found to give resistance, yet the want of means to feed such an Armie, and the Famine, which cannot be prevented, will, without any other violence offered, dif-inable and consume it. By these arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xerxes, not daring perchance to utter what indeed he most feared, to wit, the overthrow of the Armie it self both by Sea and Land, which soon after followed. These cautions were exceeding weighty, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not mis-prised them. For, to invade by Sea upon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succoured by any party, may better fit a Prince presuming on his fortune, than enriched with understanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England in the year 1588. who had belike never heard of this Counsell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it is very likely, that Xerxes his Armie; which could not have in it lesse than two millions of Soules, besides his beasts for Service and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and using Machiavels words, Mourire sans coutteo; die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait, and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what served themselves) for twenty hundred thousand strangers, whom they never meant to entertain, but with the sharpned points of their weapons, destroying withall whatsoever they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may believe Herodotus, the Army of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopyla, consisted of five millons, two hundred eighty three thousand, two hundred twenty men, besides Laundresses, Harlots, and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of Xerxes his answer was, That it was impossible to provide for all things; and that whosoever should enterprise any great matter, if he gave the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconveniences, he should never persue the same farther than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecessors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never grown to that greatnesse, or possest so many Kingdomes and Nations as they now did; and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were never undertaken without great perils. Which resolution of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessitie had enforc'd him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which he already commanded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperitie of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes his Dominions (of whose resolution his Father Darius had made a dear experience) the fruit of this Warre was answerable to the plantation, and the successe and end agreeable to the weak counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported and yet in his own judgement not sufficient, (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to fear the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wisely said of those uncountable multitudes: Non virtus habent, sed pondus, & impedimenta potiùs sunt quàm auxilium; They are great in bulk, but weak in forces, and rather a laggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshall such a world of men in one Army, so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Persian commanders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to work. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded ten Armies of fiftie thousand choſen Souldiers in each, and sent them yearly into Greece well victualled and furnished, he had either prevailed by the sword, or forced them to forsake their territorie, or brought them into obedience by necessitie and famine, which cannot be resisted. But while Xerxes resolved to cut down the banks of Greece, and to let in a sea of men upon them, he was deceived both of his own hopes, and in their hearts whom he employed, and beaten by the Greeks, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himself, conducted by his fear, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Army was buried in Greece: the remainder whereof, which wintred in Thessaly, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the enterprise, was in the summer following utterly defeated, and himself slain.

§. III.

Of the fights at Thermopylæ and Artemisium.

After such time as Xerxes had transported the Armie over the Hellespont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage alongst that Coast, and how the River of Lissus was drunk dry by his multitudes, and the lake neer to Pistyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speak of the encounters he had, and the shamefull and incredible overthrowes which he received. As first at Thermopyla, a narrow passage of half an acre of ground, lying between the Mountains which divide Thessalie from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had raised a wall with gates, which was then for the most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedæmonians, assisted with one thousand Tegeatæ and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole; besides one thousand Phocians, four hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (such as they were) of the bordering Locrians, defended the passage two whole dayes together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the Greeks appeared so excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight, Xerxes is said to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had utterly despised: and when the second dayes attempt upon the Greeks had proved vain, he was altogether ignorant how to proceed further, and so might have continued, had not a runnagate Grecian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of mountains, and set upon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greeks, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedæmonians, with his three hundred, and seven hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, refuse to quit the place which they had undertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely resist that world of men which charged them on all sides; but issuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well be called vanquishers, though all of them were slain upon the place. Xerxes having lost in this last fight, together with twenty thousand other Souldiers and Captains, two of his own brethren, began to doubt what inconvenience might befall him by the vertue of such as had not been present at these battels, with whom he knew that he shortly was to deal. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great fear, whose manhood had appeared singular in this triall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring bring into the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to have terrified him by saying, That the flight of the Persian arrows was so thick as would hide the sun: he answered thus; It is very good news: for then shall we fight in the cool shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely been expressed in deeds, as it was uttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arm well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedæmonians, though inferior to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwaies well advised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course were fittest to be taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces should assemble together to defend the Isthmus, that streight neck of ground which joyneth Peloponnesus to the Continent. For which cause he advised, That three hundred ships well manned should be sent unto the Coast of Laconia, to spoilt he country, and to hold the Lacedæmonians and their neighbours busied at home, whilst Xerxes at his leisure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power upon them, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further advised, That the said Fleet of three hundred ships should seize upon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying near to the Coast of Laconia, might serve as a fit place of Rendezvous upon all occasions, either of their own defence, or endamaging the enemy: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedæmonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrymen to have that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might have taken, had it bin followed, it is not easie to ghesse. But a contrarie opinion of Achæmenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the safer. For the Persian fleet had bin sorely vexed with a grievous tempest, which continued three whole days together, wherein were lost upon the Coast of Magnesia, four hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseen, that if any such calamitie should overtake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achæmenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet; for if (said he) after the losse of four hundred ships we shall send away other three hundred to seek adventures, then will the Greeks be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Navie, which holding all together is invincible. To this counsell Xerxes yeelded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them stand the other in good stead, whilest both held one course, and lay not far asunder. But herein he was far deceived; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greeks by land, his Navie likewise made a sorrowfull proof of their skill and courage at sea. The Grecians fleet lay at that time at Artemisium in the straits of Eubœa, where the Persians thinking to incompasse them, sent two hundred sayl about the Iland to fall upon them behind, using a like stratagem to that which their King did practise against Leonidas in a case not unlike, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which divideth Eubœa from the main, was in the same sort held by a Navie of two hundred threescore and eleven sail against the huge Persian Armado, as the straits of Thermopoyla had formerly bin maintained by Leonidas, till he was circumvented, as this Navie might have bin, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Iland, and the cause of their voyage, was too well known in the Persian fleet, and soon enough disclosed to the Greeks, who setting sail by night, met them with a counter-surprise, taking and sinking thirty vessels, inforcing the rest to take the Sea, where being over-taken with foul weather, they were driven upon the rocks and cast all away. Contrariwise, the Navie of the Greeks was increased by the arrivall of fiftie three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their partie in the last fight. As these new forces encouraged the one side, so the fear of Xerxes his displeasure stirred up the other to redeem their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their unfortunate policie, they resolved in plain fight to repair their honour, and casting themselves into the form of a Crescent, thought so to inclose the Greeks, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium.

The fight endured from noon till night, and ended with equall losse to both parts. For though more of the Persian ships were sunk and taken, yet the lesser losse fell altogether gether as heavie, upon the Greekish fleet, which being small could worse bear it. Herein only the Barbarians may seem to have had the worse, that they forsook the place of fight, leaving the wrack and spoils to the enemy, who nevertheless were fain to abandon presently even the passage which they had undertaken to defend; both for that many of their ships were sorely crusht in the battell, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopyla. Before they wayed anchors, Themistocles, Generall of the Athenians, engraved upon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either they should revolt unto the Greeks, or stand neutrall; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

§. IV.

The attempt of Xerxes upon Apollo's Temple: and his taking of Athens.

WHen Xerxes had past the straits of Thermopyla, he wasted the country of the Phocians, and the regions adjoining: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flie, and reserve themselves to a day of battel, than to adventure their lives into his hands, upon hope of saving their wealth, by making proffer unto him of their service. Part of his armie he sent to spoil the Temple of Delphi, which was exceeding rich by means of many offerings that hath bin made by divers Kings and great personages; of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inventory than of the goods left in his own Palace. To make relation of a great astonishment that fell upon the companies which arrived at the Temple to have sacked it, and of two Rocks that breaking from the Mount Parnassus, overwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peradventure somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, saith, That the broken Rocks remained even to his memory in the Temple of Minerva, whither they rowled in their fall. And surely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing he beleeved that Apollo was a god, he should not have dared to entertain a covetous desire of inriching himself by committing sacrilege upon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastise his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted unto the devill, by that Holy One, who saith, Will a man spoyl his gods? and elsewhere; Hath any Nation changed their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and send to Kedar, and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impiety of Xerxes was the more inexcusable, for that the Persians alleged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athenians, when they set fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waste which they made in burning of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprise against Delphos, this vizzor of holy and zealous revenge falling off, discovered the face of covetousnesse so much the more ugly, by how much the more themselves had professed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meer mischance.

Mal. 3. 8.
Jer. 2. 9, 10.

The remainder of that which Xerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He cometh Athens, which finding forsaken, he took and burnt the Cittadel and Temple which was therein. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisdome, who litterally interpreting Apollo's Oracle, that Athens should be safe in wooden walls, had fortified that place with Boords and Palisadoes: too weak to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first assault, that they might have yeelded it upon tolerable conditions, had they not vainly relied upon the prophecie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present need, than fashioning the businesse to words.

§. V.

How Themistocles the Athenian drew the Greeks to fight at Salamis.

THe Athenians had before the coming of Xerxes removed their wives and children into Trazene, Ægina, and Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedome, and the common libertie of Greece. Nevertheless, this great great zeal, which the Athenians did shew for the generall good of their Countrie, was ill requited by the other Greeks, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilest they removed their wives and children out of the Citie. But when the City of Athens was taken, it was presently resolved upon, that they should forsake the Isle of Salamis, and withdraw the fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnesus by land and sea, leaving the rest of Greece as indefensible, to the furie of the enemie. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Ægina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) have been given over into mercilesse bondage. Against his resolution Themistocles, Admirall of the Athenian Fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vain. For the Peloponnesians were so possessed with fear of losing their own, which they would not hazzard, that no perswasions could obtain of them to regard the estate of their distressed Friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made unto them, to allure them to abide the enemie at Salamis; As first in private unto Eurybiades the Lacedæmonian Admirall of the whole fleet; That the self same fear which made them forsake those coasts of Greece, upon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to dissever the Fleet, and every one of the Confederates to with-draw himself to the defence of his own City and Estate: Then to the Councell of War, which Eurybiades upon this motion did call together (forbearing to object what want of courage might work in them hereafter;) he shewed that the fight at Isthmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the streights; and that, besides the safeguard of Ægina, Megara and Salamis, they should by abiding where they then were, sufficiently defend Isthmus; which the Barbarians should not so much as once look upon, if the Greeks obtained victory by sea; which they could not so well hope for elsewhere, as in that present place which gave him so good advantage. All this would not serve to retain the Peloponnesians, of whom one, unworthy of memorie, upbraided Themistocles with the losse of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for suffering one to speak in the Councell, that had no Countrie of his own to inhabite. A base and shamefull objection it was, to lay as a reproach that losse, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a replie so sharp, as availed more than all his former perswasions. He told them all plainly, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie than any Nation of Greece could boast of; having well-neer two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Grecian Fleet, with which it was easie for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselves in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremity had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a Town in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which Town he said an Oracle had foretold, That the Athenians in processe of time should build it a-new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our selves, leaving unto you a sorrowfull remembrance of my words, and of your own unthankfulnesse. The Peloponnesians hearing thus much, began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affairs depended not, as they well perceived, upon so weak termes, that they should be driven to crouch to others; but rather were such, as might enforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend even to the uttermost of their own demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroicall resolution of leaving their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessitie should enforce them so farre, for the preservation of their liberty, did employ the most of their private wealth, and all the common treasure, in building a great Navie. By these means they hoped (which accordingly fell out) that no such calamity should befall them by Land, as might not well be counterpoised by great advantages at Sea: Knowing well that a strong fleet would either procure victory at home, or a secure passage to any other Country. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Navie. Whereby it came to pass, that, had they bin vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetuall slavery; neither could they hope to be victorious without the assistance of the Athenians, whose forces by Sea sea did equall all theirs together; the whole consisting of more than three hundred and fourscore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their own condition, which would have stood upon desperate points, if the Fleet of Athens had forsaken them, were soon perswaded, by the greater fear of such a bad event, to forget the lesser, which they had conceived of the Persians: and laying aside their insolent bravery, they yeelded to that most profitable counsell of abiding at Salamis.

§. VI.

How the Persians consulted about giving battell: and how Themistocles by policie held the Greeks to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon ensuing.

IN the mean season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captains giving such advice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed upon the fight; but Artemisia Queen of Halicarnassaus, who followed Xerxes to this warre in person, was of contrary opinion: Her counsell was, that the King himself directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greek Navie (unable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of provision) should presently be dissevered, and every one seeking to preserve his own Citie and goods, they should, being divided, prove unable to resist him, who had won so far upon them when they held together. And as the profit will be great in forbearing to give battell; so on the other side, the danger will be more (said she) which we shall undergoe, than any need requireth us to adventure upon; and the losse in case it fall upon us, greater than the profit of the victorie which we desire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would have done, we sitting still: but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put us to the worst, the journey to Peloponnesus is utterly dasht, and many that now declare for us, will soon revolt unto the Greeks. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had sent for that purpose to the Fleet, related unto his Master the common consent of the other Captains, and withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her advice, yet resolved upon following the more generall, but far-worse counsell of the rest; which would questionlesse have been the same which Artemisia gave, had not fear and flatterie made all the Captains utter that, as out of their own judgement, which they thought to be most comformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeed that Xerxes had entertained a vain perswasion of much good, that his own presence upon the shore to behold the conflict, would work among the Souldiers. Therefore he encamped upon the Sea-side, pitching his own Tent on the Mount Ægaleus; which is opposite unto the Isle of Salamis, whence at ease he might safely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to write down the acts and behaviour of every Captain. The neer approach of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence which their Countrymen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a-pace thither, did now again so terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie nor contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meer madnesse to fight for a Country already lost, when they rather should endeavour to save that which remained unconquered; propounding chiefly to themselves what miserie would befall them, if losing the victorie, they should be driven into Salamis, there to be shut up, and besieged round in a poor desolate Iland.

Hereupon they resolved forth-with to set sail for Isthmus: which had presently been done, if the wisedome of Themistocles had not prevented it. For he perceiving what a violent fear had stopt up their ears against all good counsell, did practise another course, and forth-with labour to prevent the execution of this unwholsome decree; not suffering the very hour of performance to find him busie in wrangling alteration. As soon as the Councell brake up, he dispatched secretly a trustie Gentleman to the Persian Captains, informing them truly of the intended flight, and exhorting them to send part of their Navie about the Iland, which incompassing the Greekes, might prevent their escape; giving them withall false hope of his assistance. The Persians no sooner heard than beleeved these good newes, well knowing that the victorie was their own assured, assured, if the Athenian fleet joyned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what ability their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captains with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their City, and Territories. By these means in fell out, that when the Greeks very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they found themselves incloſed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all that night, sending many of their ships about the Isle of Salamis, to charge the enemy in rear, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Psittalea, which lyeth over against Salamis, to save such of their own, and kill such of the Grecian party, as by any misfortune should be cast upon the shore. Thus did meer necessitie enforce the Gracians to undertake the battell in the straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victory, stemming the foremost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foul one upon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flie. I doe not find any particular occurrences in this great battell to be much remarkable. Sure it is, that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome task of writing down many disasters that befell the Persian Fleet, which ill acquitted it self that day, doing no one piece of service worthy the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greeks, they might well seem to have wrought out that victory with equall courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Ægina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Landarmy of Xerxes lay, the ships of Ægina having possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, whilest the Athenians did valiantly give charge upon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of resisting.

Of things following after the battell of Salamis: and of the flight of Xerxes.

After the victory, this Greeks intending by way of Scrutinie, to determine which of the Captains had best merited of them, in all this great service; every Captain, being ambitious of that honour, did in the first place write down his own name, but in the second place, as best deserving next unto himself, almost every Suffrage did concur upon Themistocles. Thus private affection yeelded unto vertue, as soon as her own turn was served. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamity, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such fashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discern his faint heart through his painted looks. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to cast a wary eye upon his Master, fearing lest his counsell should be rewarded according to the event. Wherefore purposing rather to adventure his life in pursuit of the victorie, than to cast it away by undergoing his Princes indignation, hee advised the King to leave unto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces hee promised to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall hee forgot not to sooth Xerxes with many fair words, telling him, That the cowardise of those Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Cilicians, with others of the like metall, nothing better than slaves, who had so ill behaved themselves in the late Sea-service, did not concern his honour, who had alwayes been victorious, and had already subdued the better part of Greece, yea taken Athens it self, against which the War was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings ear, who presently betook himself to his journey homewards, making the more haste, for that he understood, how the Greeks had a purpose to saile to Hellespont, and there to break down his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greeks had no such intent, but rather wished his hasty departure, knowing that hee would leave his Armie not so strong, as it should have been, had he in person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counsell, that by no means they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessity should inforce the Persians to take more courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement unto this timorous Prince, advising him to convey himself into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissolved: which counsell Xerxes took very kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that he found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torn in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbark himself in some obscure vessell, it is not greatly materiall; though the Greeks did most willingly imbrace the latter of these reports. Howsoever it were, this flight of his did well ease the Country, that was thereby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before overwhelmed it.

§. VIII.

The negotiations between Mardonius and the Athenians, as also between the Athenians and the Lacedæmonians, after the flight of Xerxes.

Mardonius with his three hundred thousand had withdrawn himself into Thessalie, whence he sent Alexander, the son of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassador to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as farre as their own desires; allowing them to retain their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and assist him in that warre.

The Athenians had now re-entred their City, but not as yet brought back their wives and children; for as much as they well perceived that the place could not be secure, till the Army of Mardonius was broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedæmonians, understanding what fair conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great fear, lest he should find good and ready acceptance. Hereupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadors for Athens, who arriving before the Macedonian had audience, used the best of their perswasion to retain the Athenians firm. They alleged, that neither Xerxes nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subversion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that City, were drawn into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of injustice could not leave them. Wee know, said they, that yee have endured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driven to forsake the Town, the houses thereof be ruined, and unfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, wee undertake to maintain as our own, your wives and children amongst us, as long as the warre shall continue, hoping that yee, who have alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into slavery and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promises are large, but their words and oathes are of no assurance. It was needlesse to use many arguments to the Athenians, who gave answer to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadors; That whilest the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither Gold nor any riches, with which hee might seek to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wives and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustain themselves, only desiring the Lacedæmonians, that with all speed they would cause their Armie to march, forasmuch as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long sit still in Thessalie, having once received such a peremptorie answer. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to invade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as soon as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did forthwith lead his Army towards them, and their City: they having now the second time quitted it, and conveyed themselves into places of more security abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arrivall of their confederates. From Athens he sent his Agent unto them, with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his party. His hope was, that either the people, wearied with forsaking their houses so often, would be desirous to preserve them from fire, and to have those which were already laid waste, re-edified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needs they would relie upon their old confederates, whose succors did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the leaders might be wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects, if they should fail, the destruction of Athens would be a good mean to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needs understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their own Countrie. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidus, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrsilus

Cyrsilus, adviſed the Senate to accept the conditions, and propounded them to the people; all the Senators, & as many as abiding without the Counſail-houſe, heard what he had ſaid, immediatly ſet upon him, and ſtoned him to death; not examining whether it were fear or mony, that had moved him to utter ſuch a vile ſentence. Yea, the women of Athens, and in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counſail, and bad end, aſſembling together did enter his houſe there, and put his wife and children to the like execution. All this bravery notwithſtanding, when they perceived the ſlackneſſe of the Peloponneſians in giving them aid, they were fain to betake themſelves to Salamis again, the old place of their ſecurity. Remaining there, and ſeeing little forwardnes in thoſe whom it moſt concerned to aſſiſt them, they ſent very ſevere meſſages to Sparta, complaining of their ſlacknes, and threatning withall, to take ſuch courſe as might ſtand beſt with their own good, ſeeing that the common eſtate of all was ſo little regarded. Theſe meſſengers were at the firſt entertained with dilatory anſwers, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponneſian Wall, builded athwart the Iſthmus, was almoſt finiſhed. But as the Lacedæmonians waxed careleſs and dull, ſo the Athenians hotly preſſed them to a quick reſolution, giving them plainly to underſtand, that if they ſhould hold on in thoſe dilatory courſes, it would not be long ere the City of Athens took a new courſe, that ſhould little pleaſe them. All this while the Perſian fleet lay upon the coaſt of Aſia, not daring to draw nearer unto Greece, as being now too weak at Sea. Likewiſe the Greekiſh Navie contained it ſelf within the Harbours upon Europe ſide; both to doe ſervice where need ſhould require at home; and withall to ſhun the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that (being diſtracted from the reſt) had adventured over-far. So mutuall fear preſerved in quiet the Ilands lying in the midſt of the Ægean Seas. But it was well and ſeaſonably obſerved by a Counſellor of Sparta, that the Wall upon Iſthmus would ſerve to little purpoſe for the defence of Peloponneſus, if once the Athenians gave ear to Mardonius: conſidering that many doors would be opened into that Demie-Iland, as ſoon as the Enemy ſhould by winning the friendſhip of Athens, become the Maſter of the Seas about it. The Lacedæmonians upon this admonition, making better peruſall of their own dangers, were very carefull to give ſatisfaction to the Athenian Embaſſadors, who not brooking their delaies, were upon point of taking leave, yea, as it ſeemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore diſpatching away five thouſand Spartans in the evening, under conduct of Pauſanias, they gave audience the next day to the Embaſſadors, whoſe complaints they anſwered with vehement proteſtations of their readineſſe; deeply ſwearing that the Army of Sparta was already far upon the journy, and giving them leave to take up other five thouſand Lacedæmonians, out of the Region adjoyning, to follow after them.

The Athenians, though diſtaſting ſuch want of gravity, in a matter ſo important, were nevertheleſſe contented with the finall concluſion; and levying the number appointed of Lacedæmonian Souldiers, made what haſte they could to incamp in Attica. The other Greecians were nothing ſlack in ſending forth Companies, whoſe near approach cauſed Mardonius to forſake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much diſadvantage to Horſe, wherein conſiſted the beſt of his power. Before his departure he burnt the City of Athens, beating down the Walls of it, and ruining all that had formerly eſcaped the fury of War.

The great battail of Platæa.

IT were too long a rehearſall to ſhew all that happened in many skirmiſhes between the Greeks and him, in the Country of Bœotia, which Mardonius had choſen to be the ſeat of that War. Much time was ſpent before the quarrell was decided by the triall of one main battail: for both parties did ſtand upon their guard, each expecting when the other ſhould aſſail them.

The army of Mardonius contained about three hundred thouſand, which were by him choſen out of Xerxes his Army; to whom were adjoyned the forces of Thebes, Macedony, Theſaly, and other parts of Greece, that now ſiding with the Perſian, furniſhed his Camp with fifty thouſand men. Againſt theſe the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, and their Confederats, had leavied an Army of one hundred and ten thouſand, of which forty thousand were weightily armed, the rest were only assistants to these forty thousand, being armed more sleightly, as rather to make excursions and give chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two armies having eleven daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of service; Mardonius, whose victuals began to faile, resolved to begin the fray. The Greeks were promised victory by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plain of Ceres and Proserpina, making prayers unto certain gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to find the certain place which the Oracle designed. For the plain of Ceres was indeed in the Territory of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proserpina, near unto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewise the memorials of those Nymphs and Demi-gods, were in the same place, upon Mount Citharon, and the ground served well for foot-men against horse; only the Land belonged unto the Plataans, and not unto the Athenians.

Whilst the Greeks were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle, the Plataans to make all cleer, did freely bestow their land on that side the Town upon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plataans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to re-edifie their City; which was ruined in the Peloponnesian wars.

All things being ready for battaile, the Lacedæmonian Generall thought it most meet, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertain the Thebans and other Greeks which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedæmonians; which Mardonius understanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes & Persians had felt heavie proof, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the braveſt Souldiers in Greece) he did also change the order of his battaile, and oppose himself to Pausanias. All the Greeks might well perceive how the Enemy did shift his wings, and Pausanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greeks at their watering place, that they were fain to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselves, and none to the enemy, lye near to that fountain which did serve all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Army being sent away before day-light: Mardonius perceived their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which to him seemed to proceed out of meer cowardise) he charged them in the reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valour, That the Lacedæmonians being over-taken by the enemies horse, and over-whelmed with great flights of Arrows, did quietly sit still, not making any resistance or defence, till the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slain, and some of especiall mark lost, before any sign of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soon as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superstition of that Age and Country accounted fortunate; he gave the Signall of battaile: and thereupon the Souldiers, who till then did sit upon the ground, as was their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging upon them without any fear of such notable resistance. The rest of the Greek Army that was in march, being revoked by Pausanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedæmonians: only that part of the Army which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive unto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and others Greeks confederated with the Persians, gave them check by the way. Nevertheless, the Spartans with other their assistants, did so well acquit themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more slain in the field; the rest fled into the Camp, which they had fortified with wooden Walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessity inforced them unto, holding out the longer, because the Lacedæmonians were not acquainted with the manner of assaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the mean time the Athenians having found strong opposition of the Thebanes and Thessalians, did with much labour and courage obtain victory, which having not long pursued, they came to help the Lacedamonians, whom they found wearily busied in assaulting the Camp, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they themselves under-took it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall; at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greeks entred with such fury, and just desire of vengeance, that of three hundred thousand they are said not to have left three thousand alive, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when as the Persian Army first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retrait, or rather flight into the Camp. For though it were so, that the place was well fortified, and the number of those who cast themselves into it greater than any of the Assailants; yet they being of severall Nations and Languages, and having lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was impossible that they in such a terrour and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrey, against an Army of men, farre more valiant than themselves, and enflamed with present victory. Therefore the same wall which for a few hours had preserved their lives, by holding out the enemy, did now impale them, and leave them to the slaughtering fury of unpitifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessaly, and other Countries in his way, that he was sent by Mardonius upon some piece of service: For he well knew, that had they understood any thing of that great disconfiture, all places would have been hostile unto him, and sought with his ruine to purchase favour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behind and lost, he came to Byzantium, whence he shipped his men over into Asia. Such was the end of the vain-glorious expedition, undertaken by Xerxes against the Greeks, upon hope of Honour, and Conquest, though sorting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seen, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which never ended before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greeks, despised and sought to have been brought into slavery. Hereby it may seem, that the vision appearing to Xerxes, was from God himself, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subversion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greeks, who thus provoked, entred into greater consideration of their own strength, and the weakness of their Enemies.

The battell of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning: and examples of the like.

THe same day on which the battell was fought at Platæa, there was another battell fought at Mycale, a Promontory, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admirals of the Greek Navie, at the request of some Ilanders and Ionians, did sail into those parts, to deliver the Samians, and procure the Ionians to revolt from the Persian. Xerxes himself at this time lay at Sardis, a City in Lidia, not far from the Sea-side, having left threescore thousand under the cómand of Tigranes, for defence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therfore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admirals of the Persian fleet, understood that the Greeks bent their course towards them, they did forth-with draw their ships aground, fortifying with Palisades and otherwise, as much ground as was needful for the encamping of all their land and sea-forces. Leutychides at his arrivall, perceiving that they meant to keep within their strength, & resolving to force them out of it, rowed with his gally close aboord the shore, and called upon the Ionians (who more for fear than good will were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greek tongue to remember liberty, and use the fair occasion which they now had to recover it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubœa, trusting that either these perswasions would prevail, or if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some jealousie in them, causing them to fight in fear of their own companions. It need not seem strange, that this very same stratagem, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeed. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficulty, to perswade those inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now in his declining estate, gave a willing ear to the sweet sound of liberty. The Persians likewise, who in their former bravery, little regarded, and lesse feared, any treason to be contrived by their subjects, were now so wary, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they took away their arms; the Milesians whom they did suspect, but would not seem to mistrust, they placed far from them, as it were for defence of the streight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, took courage in the heat of the fight, and laying hold upon such weapons as came to hand, assailed the Persians manfully within the Camp; which examples the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to have found some that durst begin. It is said that while the Greekes were yet in a march toward the Enemies Camp, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Army, that Mardonius was overthrown in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captains to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battell of Platæa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report of that great battell, wherein Paulus Æmilius overthrew Perseus the last King of Macedon, was brought to Rome in four dayes, as Livie with others do record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kind. As that of the battell by the River Sagra in Italy, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battell against the Tarquinians and the Latines, presently noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victory obtained against Lucius Antonius, who was Rebell to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promises, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himself Emperour; which newes much troubling the City of Rome, with fear of a dangerous Warre, it was suddenly reported that Antonius was slain, and his Army defeated.

Hereupon many did offer sacrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publique joy, as in such cases was accustomed. But when better inquiry was made, and the Author of these tydings could not be found, the Emperour Domitian betook himself to his journey against the Rebell: and being now with his Army in march, he received advertisement by Post, of the Victory obtained, and the death of Antonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the self-same victory, he found that the report and victory were born upon one day, though twenty thousand furlongs (which make above five and twenty hundred miles) a-sunder. It is truly said of Plutarch, that this last example gives credit unto many the like. And indeed it were very strange, if among so many rumours, begotten by forgery or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination, there should not be found (as happens in dreams among many thousand vain and frivolous) a few precisely true. Howbeit wee may find, that God himself doth sometimes use to terrifie those who presume upon their own strength, by these light means of tumultuous noises, as he raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a sound of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as he threatned Senacherib, saying; Behold, I will send a blast upon him, and he shall hear a noise, and return to his own land. Wherefore it may well have been true, that God was pleased by such means as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavie hearts, being in great fear, lest their own adventure should by no means fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their own Countrey of Greece, which was ready to be subdued by Mardonius whilest they went wandring to seek out enemies a-farre-off, upon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the battell fought at Platæa being noised among them, every man desired that his own valour in the present fight, might be some help to work out the full deliverance of Greece. In this alacrity of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plain, directly towards the enemies Camp; the Lacedæmonians conducted the other, by the Mountains and streight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first set upon the Campe (ere the Lacedæmonians could arrive on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly forcibly assault it, that they brake way through the Palissadoes and Gabions, and made themselves Masters of the place, slaying all that could not save themselves by flight. In this fight the Samians did good service, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Milesians, who upon the like jealousie, were placed by the Persians on the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages, did now (as if they had bin set of purpose to keep them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except very few, that fled through by-paths. The Lacedæmonians that day did little service, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Onely they broke such companies as retired in whole troops; making them flie dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution upon them. This was the last fight of that huge Army leavied against Greece, which was now utterly broken, and had no means left to make offensive Warre.

§. XI.

Of the barbarous qualities of Xerxes: with a transition from the Persian affairs to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthy of regard.

Xerxes lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battell; but little mind had he to revenge either this or other his great losses, being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom hee could not prevail by intreaty, nor would obtain his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband: hee thought it best to make a match between his own Son Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that means to find occasion of such familiarity as might work out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastity of the Mother did still reject him, or the beauty of the Daughter allure him, hee soon after fell in love with his own sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as ill able to govern himself in peace, as to guide his Army in warre. This young Lady having once desired the King to give her the Garment which hee then wore, being wrought by his own Wife; caused the Queen thereby to perceive her husbands conversation with her, which shee imputed not so much to the beauty of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon she conceived extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, she crayed that the Wife of Masistes, her husbands brother, the young Ladies Mother, might be given into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the abuse of such a custome, or have deluded the importunate cruelty of his Wife, by threatning her self with the like, to whatsoever she should inflict upon the innocent Lady, granted the request, and sending for his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seems, that he understood how villainously that poor Lady should be intreated, whom hee knew to be vertuous, and whom himself had loved. Masistes refused to put her away; alleging his own love, her deserving, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to move him to keep her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reviled him, saying, That hee now should neither keep the Wife which he had, nor have his Daughter whom he had promised unto him. Masistes was much grieved with these words, but much more, when he returned home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by the Queen Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lips, Ears, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Brests in like manner, which were cast unto Dogs. Masistes enraged with this villany, took his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Province he was Governour, intending to rebell and avenge himself: But Xerxes understanding his purpose, caused an army to be levied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the sword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxury, when it is joyned with absolute power.

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that hee was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore Alexander the Great, finding an image of his over-thrown, and lying upon the ground, said, That hee doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should again erect it, or, for the mischief done by him to Greece, should let it lye. But surely whatsoever his other good qualities were, he was fooliſh, and was a coward, and conſequently mercileſſe.

Therefore we may firmly believe, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, upon which the foundation of the Perſian Empire was ſo ſurely laid, that all the wickedneſſe and vanities of Xerxes, and other worſe Princes, could not overthrow it, untill it was broken by a vertue almoſt equall to that which did eſtabliſh it. In wars againſt the Egyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the firſt it had been, very good; but againſt the generall eſtate of Greece, neither he, or any of his poſterity, did ever make offenſive warre, but received many loſſes in Aſia, to which the laſt at Mycale ſerved but as an introduction; teaching the Greeks, and eſpecially the Athenians, that the Perſian was no better Souldier at his own doors, than in a forraign Country: whereof good triall was made forth-with, and much better proof as ſoon as the affairs of Athens were quietly ſetled and aſſured.

From this time forward I will therefore purſue the Hiſtorie of Greece, taking in the matters of Perſia, as alſo the eſtate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time ſhall preſent them. True it is, that the Perſian eſtate continued in her greatneſſe, many ages following, in ſuch wiſe that the known parts of the world had no other Kingdome, repreſenting the Majeſty of a great Empire.

But this greatneſſe depended onely upon the riches and power that had formerly bin acquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting ſome Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that exceſſive Luxury, where-with both it, and all, or the moſt of Empires that ever were, have been enervated, made unwieldy, and (as it were) fattened for the hungry ſwords of poor and hardy Enemies. Hereby it came to paſſe, that Xerxes and his ſucceſſours were fain to defend their Crowns with money and baſe policies; very ſeldome or never (unleſſe it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the triall of plain battell with that little Nation of Greece; which would ſoon have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and jealouſie urged every City to envie the height of her neighbours wals, and therby diverted the ſwords of the Greeks into their own bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes began very well, and might better have continued, to hew out the way of conqueſt on the ſide of Aſia.

CHAP. VII.

Of things that paſſed in Greece from the end of the Perſian Warre, to the beginning of the Peloponneſian.

§. I.

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

AFTER that the Medes and Perſians had received their laſt blow, and were utterly beaten at Mycale: Leutychides, who then commanded the Grecian Army, leaving the purſuit of the warre to the Athenians, aſſiſted by the revolted Ienes, returned with the Lacedæmonians and other Peloponneſians to Sparta and other places, out of which they had been leavied. The Athenians in the mean while beſieged Seſtos, a City on the ſtrait of the Helleſpont, between which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately faſtned his Bridge of Boats: where the Inhabitants, deſperate of ſuccour, did not long diſpute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greeks, who entertained themſelves the Winter following on that ſide the Helleſpont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children, ſince the invaſion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in divers Iſlands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their own places.

And though the moſt part of all their houſes in Athens were burnt and broken down, and the walls of the City over-turned, yet they reſolved firſt on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to cover themſelves, their wives and children, with any private buildings. Whereof the Lacedæmonians being advertiſed, and miſliking the fortifying of Athens, both in reſpect that their own City of Sparta was unwalled, as alſo becauſe the Athenians were grown more powerfull by Sea, than either themſelves, or any other State of Greece, they diſpatched meſſengers to the Athenians to diſſwade them; not acknowledging any private miſlike or jealouſie, but pretending, that if the Perſians ſhould return to invade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better ſtate to defend themſelves than heretofore, the ſame would ſerve to receive their enemies, and to be made a Seat for the War, as Thebes had lately bin. To this the Athenians promiſed to give them ſatisfaction by their own Embaſſadors very ſpeedily. But being reſolved to goe on with their works by the advice of Themiſtocles, they held the Lacedæmonians in hope of the contrary, till they had raiſed their walls to that height, as they cared not for their miſlikes, nor doubted their diſturbance; and therefore (to gain time) they diſpatched Themiſtocles towards Lacedæmon, giving him for excuſe, that he could not deliver the Athenians reſolutions, till the arrival of his fellow-Commiſſioners, who were of purpoſe retarded. But after a while, the Lacedæmonians expectation being converted into jealouſie (for by the arrivall of divers perſons out of Attica, they were told for certain, That the walls of Athens were ſpeedily grown up beyond expectation) Themiſtocles prayed them not to beleeve reports and vain rumors, but that they would be pleaſed to ſend ſome of their own truſty Citizens to Athens, from whoſe relation they might reſolve themſelves, and determine accordingly. Which requeſt being granted, and Commiſſioners ſent, Themiſtocles diſpatched one of his own, by whom he adviſed the Athenians, firſt to entertain the Lacedæmonians with ſome ſuch diſcourſe as might retain them a few daies, and in concluſion to hold them among them, till himſelf, & the other Athenian Embaſſadors, then at Sparta, had their liberty alſo to return. Which done, and being alſo aſſured by his aſſociats and Ariſtides, that Athens was already defenſible on all parts, Themiſtocles demanding audience, made the Lacedæmonians know, That it was true that the walls of Athens were now raiſed to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their City; praying the Lacedæmonians to beleeve, That whenſoever it pleaſed them to treat with the Athenians they would know them for ſuch as might well underſtood what appertained to a Common-weale and their own ſafety, without direction & advice from any other: That they had in the war of Xerxes abandoned their City, and committed themſelves to the wooden Walls of their ſhips, from the reſolution of their own counſels and courage, and not thereto taught or perſwaded by others: and finally, in all that perillous war againſt the Perſians they found their own judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferiour, or leſſe fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Common-weale among the Greeks. And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Maſters and Judges of their own affairs, and thonght it good reaſon, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece ſhould be left open, or elſe that the Walls of Athens ſhould be finiſhed and maintained.

The Lacedæmonians finding the time unfit for quarrell, diſſembled their miſlike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the diviſion; and ſo ſuffered the Athenians to depart, and received back from them their own Embaſſadors.

The Walls of Athens finiſhed, they alſo fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might under covert imbark themſelves upon all occaſions.

§. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatneſſe, and proſperous war made by that State upon the Perſian.

THe Athenians having ſetled things in good order at home, prepared thirty Gallies for the purſuit of the war againſt the Perſians, to which the Lacedæmonians added other twenty, and with this Fleet, ſtrengthened by the reſt of the Cities of Greece confederated, they ſet ſail for Cyprus, under the conduct of Pauſanias the Lacedæmonian; where, after their landing having poſſeſt themſelves of many principall places, they imbarked the Army again, and took land in Thrace, recovering from the the Persians by force the City Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behaving himself more like a Tyrant than a Captain, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called back by the Councell of Lacedemon, and not only accused of many insolent behaviours, but of Intelligence with the Medes, and Treason against his Country. In his stead they imployed Dorcres, who either gave the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commandement in that war, practised the Souldiers to complain; though indeed the wise and vertuous behaviour of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare & incomparable sincerity, had been able to make a good Commander seem ill in comparison of himself; & therefore was much more availeable, in rendring those detested, whose vices afforded little matter of excuse. Howsoever it were, the Lacedæmonians being no lesse wearied of the war, than the Athenians were eager to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honour which they desired: for all the Greeks (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselves to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruin in the next succeeding. For the charge of the war being now committed unto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities; they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and began to levie mony, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall defence of Greece, & for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Asia the lesse, and the Ilands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever payed by the Greeks) amounted to four hundred and threescore Talents; which was raised easily by the honest care of that just man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complain of him. But as the vertue of Aristides, & other worthy Citizens, brought unto the Athenians great commodity; so the desire which they conceived of encreasing their commodity, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall love, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their City to the defence of her treasure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long ere these four hundred and threescore Talents were raised to six hundred, nor long after that, ere their covetous tyranny had coverted their followers into slaves, and extorted from them yearly thirteen hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these sums were laid up, and where, at the generall Assembly, the Captains of those forces, sent by the confederates, were for form sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt up the common treasure in an Island, under their own protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commander in this War was Cimon, the son of Miltiades, who first took Eiona, upon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they mastered the Caristii, and brought into servitude the Naxii, contrary to the form of the confederacy: So did the other the inhabitants of Greece, if at any time they failed of their contribution, or disobeyed their commandements, taking upon them & usurping a kind of soveraign authority over the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become Lords of the Sea, and could not be resisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, weary of the war in their own persons, and given up altogether to their ease, made choice rather to pay their parts in mony, than either in men of war, or in ships; leaving the provision of both to the Athenians. Hereby the one grew weak in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Wars; the other greatly strengthened their Navie and their experiences, being always armed and imployed in honorable Services, at the cost of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-mony, levied upon these their confederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded upon good beginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith Cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiatick Seas, took in the City of Phaselis; which having formerly pretended neutrality, and refused to relieve, or any way assist the Greeks, were enforced to pay ten Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the Athenians, paying yearly contribution.

From thence he set sail for the River Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet

Fleet rode, being of six hundred sayl, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fifty, and having a great Land-Army, encamped upon the shoar; all which forces having been provided for advancing the Kings affairs in Greece, where utterly defeated in one day, and two hundred ships taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sunk, ere ever they had swom in the Greekish Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great victories, the one by Sea, and the other by Land, was very soon presented with a third. For fourscore sayl of Phænicians (who were the best of all Sea-men, under the Persian command) thinking to have joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived upon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and fearing nothing lesse than what ensued. Upon the first notice of their approach, Cimon weighed anchor, and meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did so amaze them, that they onely sought to run themselves on ground; by which mean preserving few of their men, they lost all their ships. These losses did so break the courage of the Persian, that omitting all hope of prevailing upon Greece, he condescended to whatsoever Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, granting liberty unto all the Greeks inhabiting Asia; and further covenanting, That none of his ships of War should sayl to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyanee and Chelidonia.

This was the most honourable peace that ever the Greeks made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any war that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till such time as under Alexander, they overthrew the Empire of Persia; in which war, few, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great command, but served altogether under the Macedonians.

§. III.

The death of Xerxes by the treason of Artabanus.

BEsides these losses, which could not easily have been repaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time such, as gave just cause to the Persian of seeking peace upon any termes not altogether intolerable. For Artabanus, the Uncle of Xerxes, perceiving, that the King his Master did easily take small occasions to shed the blood of such, as in kindred or place were neer unto him, began to repose lesse hope of a safetie in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soveraigntie, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his cruelty, and despised for his cowardise and misfortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found means to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himself had been innocent) he accused Darius the son of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesse hee got the Kingdome, and held it seven moneths; or whether intending the like evill to Artaxerxes the son of Xerxes, he was by him prevented and surprised, were hard to affirm any certainty. But all Writers agree upon this, That taken hee was, and with his whole family put to death by extreme torments, according to the sentence whereof the truth is more ancient than the Verse;

Raro antecedentem scelestum
Deseruit pede pœna claudo.

Seldome the villain, though much haste he make,
Lame-footed Vengeance fails to over take.

§. IV.

The banishment of Themistocles: his flight to Artaxerxes newly reigning in Persia; and his death.

ARtaxerxes being established in his Kingdome, and having so compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessity of his affairs required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greeks, than hee or his predecessors had ever hitherto found. For the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their own merits in that service, that they not onely thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders over many Towns and Islands of the Greeks, but even within their own walls, they would admit none other forme of Government than meerly Democraticall. Herein they were so insolent, that no integritie nor good desert was able to preserve the estate of any such as had born great office, longer than by flattering the ratcall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deeds to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse upon popularity, yet now presuming upon his good services done to the State, he thought that with great reason they might grant him the liberty to check their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwise, they were so highly offended with his often rehearsing the benefits which they had received from him, that they laid upon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby hee was banished for ten years, as a man over-burthensome to the Common-wealth.

Before the time of his return was half expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedæmonians, who charged him of consulting with Pausanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece unto Xerxes, Hereupon Themistocles, finding no place of security against the malice of two such mighty cities, was driven, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himself into Persia, where he found Artaxerxes newly setled, & was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advancing his affairs by the counsell and assistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in favour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infested Egypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Army in Egypt, and scouring those Eastern Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with Xerxes; then did the King send his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which he had given, of assuring the Persian estate against the Greeks.

But whether Themistocles perceived much unlikelinesse of good successe, in leading a great army of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in favour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the love of his Country would not permit him to seek honour by the ruine of it, sure it is, that being appointed by Artaxerxes to undertake the conduct of great forces against the Athenians, he decided the great conflict between thankfulnesse to his well-deserving Prince, and naturall affection to his own ill-deserving people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyson.

§. V.

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Egypt.

THen was Artaxerxes driven to use the service of his own Captains in the Egyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemy. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred saile strong was sent forth under Cimon, to take-in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintain, the Persian being utterly broken at Sea, and thereby unable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to have been kept sincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Gracian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any ships of Warre (without which the Greeks could receive no harm from him) whereof if any one should be found sayling towards Greece, the peace was immediatly broken, and if not, his whole estate; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemy too far over-marching him. Yet whether the Athenians were in doubt, lest the league which in his own worser fortunes he had made with them, he would break in theirs; and therefore sought to get such assurance into their hands, as might utterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their revenues and power, by adding that rich and great Island to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wisest way, to take whilest they might, whatsoever they were able to get and hold, and he unable to defend.

The Isle of Cyprus lying in the bottome of the streights between Cilicia, Syria and Egypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seek to enrich himself by trade with those Countries, or to infest one or more of them them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already devoured, in conceit, this Iland, was on the sudden well-nigh choaked with a greater morsell, to snatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily have swallowed and digested. For Inarus King of the Lybians, confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Countrey was exhausted by the late Warres, and how weakly defended by very slender Persian Garrisons, conceived rightly, that if such small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the sudden of his own Guards, or levie out of the ordinary Garrisons, were by him defeated; the naturalls of the Countrey not long since oppressed by Cambyses, and after a revolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soon break faith with him, who had no other title to that Kingdome than a good sword. Further, he perswaded himself that the people, unable to defend themselves against the Persian without his assistance, would easily be drawn to accept him, the author of their deliverance, for King. Neither did this hope deceive him. For having taken and cruelly slain Achaemenes the Viceroy, divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclaiming him King, shewed the most of their indeavour for prosecution of the Warre. But hee considering his own weaknesse, and that the means of the Egyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived well, that to resist the power of Artaxerxes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price soever hee obtained them. Therefore hearing of the great Athenian fleet, and knowing well the vertue of the Souldiers therein embarqued, he invited the Commanders to share with him the Kingdome of Egypt, as a farre greater reward of their adventure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether he or they (if things had wholly forced according to their expectation) would have been contented with an equall share, and not have fallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination unnecessary. He was possessed of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affairs was such as left them nothing to communicate but misfortunes, which they shared somewhat equally.

Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe. For they ousted the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie, and of the Citie it self they took two parts: to the third part, which was called the White wall, they laid such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Egypt, were strong enough to remove them, neither could Artaxerxes well advise what means to use for the recovery of that which was lost, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by setting the Lacedaemonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to look homewards to their own defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure the assistance of the Greeks one against the other, by stirring them up with gold, to the entertainment of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemy. To this purpose he sent Megabazus to Sparta with much Treasure, who after great expence, finding that the Lacedaemonians were nothing forward in employing their whole force against the Athenians, whom in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, notwithstanding the absence of their Army in Egypt, he thought it his wisest way to employ the rest of his money and means to their relief, who had now the space of six years defended his masters right in Egypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the son of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountred by the revolted people, over whom hee obtained victory, which made him master of the Countrey, whilest the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie.

It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much enfeebled the Athenians: sure it is, that when Megabazus, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it self, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessaries made the Athenians inferiour to themselves, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neer, as they were forc'd to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eighteen moneths siege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, assaulted the Athenians without impediment of waters, took their Gallies, and put all to the sword, save a few that saved themselves by flight into Lybia, the same entertainment had fifty other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hundred hundred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell unawares among the Phœnician Gallies, and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recovered all Egypt, but that part held by Amyrteus, and Inarus the King of Lybia, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians six years Warre in Egypt, and the reward of their vanity and indiscretion to undertake many enterprises at once.

Mendesius is an Island in the mouth of Nilus, between the out-let called Busiritis, and Diecos: But the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium runneth into the sea by the City Panaphysis.

§. V.

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

NOtwithstanding these overthrowes in Egypt, yet the Athenians in their homewarres waded through many difficulties, and held the reputation of their forces against the Lacedæmonians, Corinthians, and others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neer unto Halia by the Corinthians and Epidaurians, so they obtained two great Victories soon after; the one over the Peloponnesians, neer unto Ceeryphalia; the other over the Æginets, neer unto Ægina; where they sunk and carried away threescore and ten Galles of their enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the sudden, and besieged Ægina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara; where, after a great fight, with equall losse, the Corinthians, when they returned again to set up their Trophie, as Victors in the former battell, were utterly broken and slaughtered be the Athenian Garrisons and Megarians, to their great losse and dishonour.

Again, as the Athenians were discomfited neer to Tanagra, by the Lacedæmonians, who returned from the succour of the Dorians against the Phocians (at which time the Thessalian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore daies after, the Athenians entred Bœotia under the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wan Phocis on the gulfe of Oeteus, and evened the walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Ægina to render upon most base conditions; as to beat down the walls of their City, and to give them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, notwithstanding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories, they sackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peloponnesus, belonging to the Lacedæmonians, wan upon the Corinthians, and overthrew the Sicyonians that came to their succour. These were the undertakings of the Athenians, and their Allies, during the time of those six years that a part of their forces made war in Egypt. In the end whereof they attempted Thessalie, perswaded thereunto by Orestes, but were resisted by the king Pharsalus, who had chased Orestes out of his Dominions. They also landed in Sicyonia, and had victory over those that resisted, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for five years, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred ships; but they were again allured by Amyrteus one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish and Wooddy parts of Egypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixty of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise at Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cimon dying there, as they coasted the Iland, incountred a fleet of the Phœnicians and Cilicians, over both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned safe which were sent into Egypt.

§. VI.

Of Artaxerxes Longimanus, that he was Ahashuerosh the husband of Queen Hester.

THese Egyptian troubles being ended, the reign of Artaxerxes continued peaceable; whereof the length is by some restrained unto twenty years, but the more and better Authors give him forty, some allow unto him four and forty.

He

He was a Prince of much humanity, and noted for many examples of gentlenesse. His favour was exceeding great to the Jews; as appeareth by the Histories of Esdras and Nehemias, which fell in his time.

To prove that this was the King who gave countenance and ayd to that great work of building the Temple, it were a needlesse travell; considering that all the late Divines have taken very much pains to shew that those two Prophets were licensed by him, and succoured in that building, in such sort as appears in their writings.

This was likewise that King Ahasuerosh who married Hester. Whereof if it be needfull to give proof, it may suffice, That Ahasuerosh lived in Susa, reigning from India to Æthiopia, and therefore must have been a Persian, That he lived in peace, as appears by the circumstances of the Historie, and used the counsell of the seven Princes, the authority of which Princes began under Darius the son of Hystaspes; wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyses.

The continuall Wars which exercised King Darius the Son of Hystaspes, together with the certainty of his marriages with sundry wives, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his first wife Atossa, the daughter of Cyrus, alive in great honour, she being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King, do manifestly prove that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Jew, That at the perswasion of Mardochæus, Jojachim the high Priest the son of Jesua, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memory of that deliverance. Now the time of Jojachim was in the reign of Artaxerxes, at the comming of Esdras and Nehemias: Jesua his father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of wars, with other his furious and tragicall loves wherewith Xerxes did consume such little time as he had free from war, are enough to prove, that the story of Hester pertained not unto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twenty years, whereas the two and thirtieth of Ahasuerus or Artasastha is expressed by Nehemias. Again, it is well known that Xerxes in the seventh year of his reign (wherein this marriage must have bin celebrated) came not neer to Susa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to prove that none of them could be Ahasuerosh, it is enough to say, that Mardochæus having been carried from Hierusalem captive, with Jechonia, by Nabuchadnezzar, was unlikely to have lived untill their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Susa, reigned from India to Æthiopia, lived in peace, was contemporary with Jojachim the high Priest, and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaymed the rebellious Egyptians in that seventh year of his reign; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Royall Feast, as is described in the beginning of Hester. This is the sum of the arguments, brought to prove the age of Hesters storie by the learned and diligent Krentzheimius, who addes the authorities of Josephus, affirming the same, and of Philo giving to Mardochæus eighteen years more than Isaac the Patriarch lived, namely, one hundred fourscore and eighteen years in all, which expire in the five and thirtieth year of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to have been carried away captive, being a Boy of ten years old.

§. VIII.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian War.

But it is fit that we now return to the affairs of the Greeks, who from this time forward, more vehemently prosecuting their civill wars, suffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this Egyptian expedition being come to nought. Soon after this, the Lacedæmonians undertook the war called Sacred, recovered the Temple and Ile of Delphos, and delivered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the same, and gave it in charge to the Phocians. In the mean while the banished Bœotians re-entred their own Land, and mastered two of their own Towns possest by the Athenians, which they soon recovered again from them; but in their return towards Athens, the Bœotians, Eubœans, and Locrians, (Nations oppress by the Athenians) set upon them with such resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all slain or taken, taken, whereby the Bœotians recovered their former liberty, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The Ilanders of Eubœa took such courage upon this, that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was advertised that the Megarians (who first left the Lacedæmonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now weary of their yoke, had slain the Athenians Garrisons, and joyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. These news hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speed; but ere he could recover Attica, the Peloponnesians, led by Plistoanax the son of Pausanias, had invaded it, pillaged and burnt many parts thereof, after whose return Pericles went on with his first intent, and recovered Eubœa. Finally, the Athenians began to treat of peace with the Peloponnesians, and yeelded to deliver up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponnesus; and this truce was made for thirty years.

After six of these years were expired, the Athenians (favouring the Mylesians against the Samians) invaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses, and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the Citizens were forc'd to yeeld themselves upon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliver up all their ships, to break down their own wals, to pay the charge of the war, and to restore whatsoever had been taken by themselves, or by their practice from the Athenians. In the neck of which followed that long and cruell Peloponnesian War, whereof I have gathered this brief following; the same contention taking beginning fiftie years after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie thereof, which either in the beginning of this war, or in the continuance of it, was not drawn into the quarrell; I hold it convenient now at the first to shew briefly the estate of the Country at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens and Sparta, upon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian War.

Upon what terms the two principall Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, stood at the beginning of the Peleponnesian War.

GReece was never united under the government of any one Prince or Estate, untill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Union and League against the Persians, whereof they were Captains, than into any absolute subjection. For every Estate held their own, and were governed by Laws, far different, and by their own Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeeld obedience no otherwise than as to such, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Persian war (deemed the Generall quarrel of Greece) and took the profit and honour of the victory, to their own use and increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterward reigned in Macedonie, did so far enlarge their authority, that all Greece was by them brought under such obedience, as differed little from servitude; very few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with arms, and sometimes with gifts, preserve their liberty; of whom the Lacedæmonians and Athenians were chief: which two people deserved best the plague of tyranny, having first given occasion thereunto by their great ambition, which wearied and weakned all the Country by perpetuall War. For untill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing every State into the quarrell, on the one or other side, and so gave beginning to the Peloponnesian War (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had over-mastered all; forasmuch as every conclusion of one war afforded henceforth matter of some new distraction of the whole Countrey) the wars, commenced between one Citie of Greece and another, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controversies were soon decided, either by the authority of the Amphictiones, who were the generall Councell of Greece, or by the power of the Lacedæmonians, whose aid was commonly held as good as the assurance of victory.

These Lacedæmonians had lived about four hundred years under one forme of Government, when the Peloponnesian War began. Their education was only to practise feats of Arms; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poor, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintain him in such manner as they used. For bravery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinary meals being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They used money of yron, whereof they could not be covetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Utopian-like, save that they used no other occupation than War, placing all their felicity in the glory of their valour. Hereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrary to this. For they sought wealth, and measured the honours of their victories by the profit, they used mercenary Souldiers in their wars, and exacted great tribute of their Subjects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in form of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference between these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, sudden in their conclusions, and as hasty in the execution. The Lacedæmonians very slow in their deliberations, full of gravity, but very resolute, and such as would in cold bloud perform what the Athenians did usually in flagrant. Whereby it came to passe, that the Lacedæmonians had all the Estates of Greece depending upon them, as on men firm and assured, that sought honour and not riches; whereas the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in streight subjection. But the Signory of the Athenians was nothing large, untill such time as the Persian Xerxes had invaded Greece, pretending only a quarrell to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiving well, that the Town of Athens could not be defended against his great Army of seventeen hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Navie, and (assisted by the other Grecians) overthrew the fleet of Xerxes, whose Land-forces were soon after discomfited by them, and the Greeks, who all served under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mighty in fleet, reduced all the Ilands of the Greekish Seas under their obedience, imposing upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of War against the Persian, though indeed they employed their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands and haven-Towns of their Country-men, as stood out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lecedæmonians, who were In-landers, and men that delighted not in expeditions to be made far from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in much jealousie, and were very apt to quarrell with them; but much more willing to breed contention between them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plateans, when they of Platæa repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aid, than this advice, That they should seek help at Athens. Hereby it was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious War with their neighbours of Thebes. But it proved otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serve to increase their honour and puissance.

§. II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into Warre.

NEverthelesse many Estates of Greece were very ill-affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent upon sudden prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Towns against the stronger, incroached apace upon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much inraged, because the people of the Iland Corcyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them a great overthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their fleet by adjoyning that of Corcyra unto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that revenge which else they would have taken. Now howsoever it were so that these dealings of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed upon among the Greeks, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much adoe) they concluded to redresse by war the injuries done to their Allies.

First therefore, seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certain offences committed against the gods; whereto having for answer, That they themselves should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta, they began to deal plainly, and required that the people of some Towns, oppressed by the State of Athens, should be set at liberty; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnestly presse, that if they might obtain it, they promised to absist from their purpose of making War.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entring into a war, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to undergoe.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole desire that all Greece should take notice how farre they were from fear of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both sides very strongly, all that was needfull to the War; wherein the Lacedæmonians were Superiour, both in number and quality, being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece, and having the generall favour, as men that pretended to set at liberty such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as far exceed them in all provisions of money, shipping, engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held, and afterward found of greater use in such need, than the willing readinesse of friends, who soon grow weary, and are not easily assembled.

§. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

THe first and second years expedition was very grievous to the Citie of Athens. For the Fields were wasted, the Trees cut down, the Countrey people driven to flye, with Wives, Children, and Cattell, into the Town; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the City, such as before they had never felt, nor heard of. Hereunto was added the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the Isle of Lesbos, and the siege of Platæa their confederated City, which they durst not adventure to raise; besides some small overthrowes received. The Lacedæmonians assembling as great forces as they could raise out of Peloponnesus, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countrey of Attica, and therein abide, untill victuals began to fail, wasting and destroying all things round about. The Governours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to issue into the field against them, for they knew the valour of their enemies: but used to send a fleet into Peloponnesus, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their enemies, whilest they were making war in Attica. So the Peloponnesians being the stronger by Land, won the Town of Platæa, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mighty by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had rebelled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that Warre, the Lacedæmonians began to perceive how unfit they were to deal with such enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harm as they themselves might, and did receive. The Confederates began to set forward very slowly in their expeditions into Attica, perceiving well that Athens was plentifully relieved with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subject unto that Estate; and therefore these invaders took but small pleasure in beholding the Walls of that mighty City, or in wasting a forsaken field, which was to them a pattern of the calamities with which their own Territorie was the whilest afflicted. Wherefore they began began to set their care to build a strong Navie, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

§. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans received at Pylus.

AMong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea, they received at Pylus a very sore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, wasting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the half-Ile of Peloponnesus, was by contrary windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontory, joyning to the Main, by a strange neck of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Iland of lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creek, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being born off by the head-Land and Isle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified as well as in haste they might, and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the naturall strength and site of the place. By holding this piece of ground, and haven, they in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Countrey adjoyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient times had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta, and (though quite subdued) they were held in streight subjection; yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the neer neighbourhood and assistance of the Athenians, it might not be revived. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedemonians, and as many of their bond-slaves as could escape from them, would repair to Pylus, and from thence make daily incursions into Laconia, which was not far off: Or if other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this haven, lying almost in the mid-way between them and Corcyra, make them able to surround all Peloponnesus, and waste it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus drew the Peloponnesians thither in all haste out of Attica, which they had entred a few dayes before with their whole Army: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Navie to recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well saw, little fearing the grievous losse at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vain made a generall assault on all sides, both by Sea and Land, finding that small Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence, they occupied the haven, placing four hundred and twenty choyce men, all of them Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell that leads into the Port, but so narrow, that onely two ships in front could enter between the Isle and Pylus, likewise but seven or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, between the Iland and the Main. Having thus taken order to shut up this new Town by Sea, they sent part of their fleet to fetch wood, and other stuffe, wherewith to fortifie round about, and block up the piece on all sides. But in the mean season the Athenian fleet hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the haven, did break and sink many of their enemies vessels; took five, and so inforced the residue to run themselves a-ground.

Now was the Town secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as lost. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the camp (as was their custome in great dangers) to advise what were best for the publike safety; who when they did perceive that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Isle, than by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians about peace, taking truce in the mean while with the Captains at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedemonians should deliver up all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the town, nor the Athenians against the camp: That a certain quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carry the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them back, at whose return the truce should end, which if in the mean time it were broken in any one point, should be held utterly voyd in all; That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Peloponnesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The Embassadors comming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begun the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedæmonians did sue to them for peace, advising them to make an end of War, whilest with such reputation they might. But they found all contrary to their expectation: For in stead of concluding upon even termes, or desiring of meet recompence for losse sustained, the Athenians demanded certain Cities to be restored to them, which had bin taken from them by the Lacedæmonians long before this warre began, refusing likewise to continue the treaty of peace, unlesse the Spartans which were in the Isle, were first rendred unto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassadors returned without effect, at which time the truce being ended, it was desired from the Athenian Captains, that they should, according to their Covenant, restore the ships which had been put into their hands. Whereto answer was made, that the condition of the truce was, that if any one article were broken, all should be held void; now (said the Athenians) ye have assaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquited of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like frivolous allegations which they made, were but meer shifts; yet profit so far overweighed honour, that better answer none could be got. Then were the Lacedæmonians driven to use many hard means, for conveyance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed that when the Peloponnesians next invaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slain. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with-held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell upon them, the Lacedæmonians were so far from wasting Attica, that they suffered their own Country to be continually over-run, both by the Athenians, who landed on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Readevous of all that were ill-affected unto them.

§. V.

How the* Lacedæmonians *hardly, and to their great disadvantage, obtained a peace that was not well kept.

THerefore they endeavoured greatly to obtain peace, which the Athenians would not hearken unto. For they were so puffed up with continuance of good success, that having sent a few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold up a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrels; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Isle were taken away, and their bands returned without either gain or losse, they banished the Captains, as if it had been meerly through their default, that the Ile of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it self, no whit inferiour unto Peloponnesus. Yet was this their over-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battell which they lost at Amphipolis, Cleon and Brasidas, Generals of the Athenian and Lacedæmonian forces, were both slain; which two had most bin adversaries to the peace. As the Athenians by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedæmonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Navie which they had received at Pylus, were fain to proceed lamely in the war, against such as, through commodity of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were fervently desirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new favour should revive the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that urged them to bring the treaty of peace to a good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which unlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they knew not how to avoyd. The estate of Argos, which had antient enmity with them, was now after a trace of thirty years well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by joyning with those who alone found them work enough. Argos was a rich and strong Citie, which though inferiour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so unwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedæmonians could ever farre prevail upon it, when they had little else to doe.

This

This was a thing that in the beginning of this War had not been regarded. For it was then thought that by waſting the Territory of Athens with ſword and fire, the quarrell ſhould eaſily and in ſhort time have been ended, whereby not only the Athenians ſhould have bin brought to good order, but the Corinthians, and others, for whoſe ſake the war was undertaken, have bin ſo firmly knit to the Lacedæmonians, that they ſhould for love of them have abandoned the Argives to their own fortunes. But now the vanity of thoſe hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready mony, & means to raiſe more, were able to ſecure themſelves by a ſtrong fleet, from any great harme that the Peloponneſians, wanting wherewith to maintain a Navie, could doe unto them; yea, as Maſters of the Sea, to weary them out, as in effect already they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither war nor peace; their daily travels, and many loſſes had ſo wearied and incenſed them. Wherfore the Lacedæmonians were glad to uſe the occaſion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much adoe they procured, as ſeemed equall and eaſie; but was indeed impoſſible to be performed, and therefore all their travell was little effectuall.

The reſtitution of priſoners and places taken being agreed upon, it fell out by lot, that the Lacedæmonians ſhould reſtore firſt. Theſe had won more Towns upon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had won, they had not won abſolutely. For they had reſtored ſome Towns to ſuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; ſome, and thoſe the moſt, they had ſet at liberty (as reaſon required) which had opened their gates unto them as to their friends and deliverers, and not compelled them to break in as enemies. Now concerning the Towns which were not in their own hands, but had bin rendred unto their Confederates, the Spartans found means to give ſome ſatisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had gotten in the War; as for the reſt, they promiſed more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to hear of being abandoned, neither would they by any means yeeld themſelves into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithſtanding whatſoever articles were drawn, and concluded, for their ſecurity, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the ſide of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing thoſe things which on their part were required; ſo that reſtoring only the priſoners which they had, they deferred the reſt, untill ſuch time as they might receive the full ſatisfaction, according to the agreement. But before ſuch time as theſe difficulties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedæmonians entred into a more ſtreight alliance with the Athenians, making a league offenſive and defenſive with them. Hereunto they were moved by the backwardneſs of the Argives, who being (as they thought) likely to have ſued for peace at their hands, as ſoon as things were once compounded between Athens and Sparta, did ſhew themſelves plainly unwilling to give eare to any ſuch motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian ſuccour, they ſhould make ſure work, the Spartans regarded not the affections of other States, whom they had either bound unto them by well-deſerving in the late war, or found ſo troubleſome, that their enmity (if perhaps they durſt let it appear) was little worſe than friendſhip. It bred great jealouſie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive ſuch a conjunction between two ſo powerfull Signiories: eſpecially one clauſe threatning every one, that was any thing apt to fear, with a ſecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceits, of ſubduing the whole Country, and taking each what they could lay hold on. For beſides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall conſent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their own pleaſures. This impreſſion wrought ſo ſtrongly in the Corinthians, Thebanes, and other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had born to the Athenians their profeſſed enemies, was violently thrown upon the Lacedæmonians their unjuſt friends: whereby it came to paſſe, that they who lately had borne chief ſway in Greece, might have been abandoned to the diſcretion of their enemies, as already in effect they were, had the enemies wiſely uſed the advantage.

§. VI.

§. VI.

Of the negotiations and practices held between many States of Greece, by occasion of the Peace that was concluded.

THe admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as unresistable, and able to make way through all impediments, had bin so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seek peace, upon terms not sounding very honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens usually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was never thought that any Lacedæmonian would have endured to lay down his weapons, and yeeld himself prisoner, nor that any misfortune should have bin so great, as should have drawn that Citie to relieve it self otherwise than by force of Armes. But when once it had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were some of especiall mark, being overlayed by enemies, in the Iland before Pylus, had rather chosen to live in captivity, than to die in fight; and that Pylus it self, sticking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred such anguish in that Estate, as utterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit down, and seek to refresh it self by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans begin to conceive basely of those men which were vertuous, though unfortunate; but other lesse Cities joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eies upon the rich and great Citie of Argos, of whose ability to doe much, they conceived a strong belief, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish envie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankind. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers, which we know to be wanting in our selves.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moved rather by envie at the greatnesse of Athens daily encreasing) the Lacedæmonians had entred into the present War. But these Corinthians did only murmure at the peace, alleging as grievances, that some towns of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantineans, who during the time of War, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forsake their dependancy upon the State of Sparta, did more freely and readily discover themselves; fear of revenge to come, working more effectually than indignation at things already past. The Argives feeling the gale of prosperous fortune that began to fill their sails, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand under; giving for that purpose unto twelve of their Citizens a full and absolute commission to make alliance between them and any free Cities of Greece (Athens & Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular businesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesus following them, entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wisest way to doe as the most did. What inconvenience might arise unto them by these courses, the Lacedæmonians easily discerned, & therfore sent Embassadors to stop the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischief had bin hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their present advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into alliance with Argos, to send their Agents to them, in whose presence they gave audience to the Lacedæmonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not forsake the alliance which they had long since made with Sparta; and that reason did as well bind them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their antient confederacy, forasmuch as it had bin agreed between the Spartans and their associats, that the consent of the greater part (which had yeelded unto peace with Athens) should bind the lesser number to performe what was concluded, if no divine impediment withstood them. Hereunto the Corinthians made answer, that the Spartans had first begun to doe them open wrong, in concluding the War wherein they had lost many places, without provision of restitution; and that the very clause alleged by the Embassadours, did acquit them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, forasmuch as they had sworn unto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would never abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall again into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselves bound both in reason and religion to use all means of upholding those, whom by common consent they had taken into protection; for that an oath was no lesse to be accounted a divine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindring the performance of things undertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they said that they would do as they should find cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors with this answer, they made haste to joyn themselves with Argos, and caused other States to do the like; so that Sparta and Athens were in a maner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also upon the point to have entred into this new confederacy. But as the affections were divers which caused this hasty confluence of sudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendship it self, such as it was, had much diversity both of sincerity and of continuance. For some there were that hated or feared the Lacedæmonians, as the Mantineans and Eleans; these did firmly betake themselves to the Argives, in whom they knew the same affection to be inveterate: others did only hate the peace concluded; and these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argives in war, yet rather the Argives in war than the Lacedæmonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like unto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the society of the Argives, as they had done: but the different formes of government, used in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebans to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incur the danger of innovation, by joyning with such as commited the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse having ill succeeded, the Corinthians began to bethink themselves of their own danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for War. They sought therefore to come to some temporary agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment with one Citie that had shewed against them more stomack than force; but gave them to understand, that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claim the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; yet finally they granted unto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowlede themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into private confederacie they would not admit them, being an article of the league between them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor war without the other.

Herein, as in many other passages, may clearly be seen the great advantage which absolute Lords have, as well in Peace as in War, over such as are served by voluntaries. Wee shall hardly find any Signiorie, that hath been so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferiour to it self, being all as free: whereas contrariwise, the Athenians had lately, and by compulsive means gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselves as Tyrants. But in performance of conditions agreed upon, the Athenians were able to make their words good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giving up such places as were agreed upon: of which the Lacedæmonians could do neither the one nor the other. For such Towns as their old Allies had gotten by their means in the late War, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Town of Panacte, which the Thebans held, could by no means be obtained from them by the Lacedæmonians (who earnestly desired it, that by restitution thereof unto the Athenians, as earnestly demanding it, themselves might recover Pylus) unlesse that they would agree to make a private alliance with Thebes; which thereupon they were constrained to doe, though knowing it to be contrary to the last agreement between them and Athens.

The Lacedæmonians having broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselves to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not give up the town of Panacte, till first they had utterly demolished it, and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was sought to have been excused by the Lacedemonian Embassadors, who comming to Athens (whither they had sent home all prisoners that had been detained at Thebes) hoping with gentle words to salve the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemie of Athens should nestle in Panactie, for it was destroyed. But these Embassadors had not to deal with tame fools. For the Athenians told them in plain termes, That of three principall conditions agreed upon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but used such base conclusions as stood not with their honour: having made private alliance with the Thebans; having destroyed a Town that they should have restored; and not having forced their dependants by Warre, to make good the Covenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deeds to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that year, in Sparta, and Alcibiades, a powerfull young Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though desiring to renew the War, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to be rendred to them by Covenant, especially Pylus that had so sorely troubled them. Alcibiades, whose Nobility, riches and favour with the people, made him desire War, as the mean whereby himself might procure some honourable employment; used all means to set the quarrel on foot, whilest the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendred ought save their prisoners, and pretence enough to use that advantage of breaking the peace, by reason that the Lacedæmonians (though indeed against their wills) had broken all Covenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retain Pylus, and to perform nothing that the Lacedæmonians should, and might require, untill they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles whereto they were bound, even to the utmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who having already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the delivery of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing a speedy beginning of open war, sent privily to the Argives, and gave them to understand how fitly the time served for them to associate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them security against all enemies.

The Argives, upon the first confluence of many Estates unto their society, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should have had the conduct of all Greece against the Athenians, robbing Sparta of that honour, as having ill used it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disability. But these sudden apprehensions of vain joy, were suddenly changed into as vain fear; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately bin conceived of Argos. For when the Thebans had refused their alliance; when the Corinthians had sought security from Athens; and when a false rumour was noysed abroad, Athens, Thebes and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of difference; then began the Argives to let fall their crests, and sue for peace unto the Lacedæmonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their gravity, and were not over-hasty to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Alcibiades came very welcome to the Argives, which were not now consulting how to become the chief of all others, but how to save themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their own Embassadors, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive and defensive between their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this businesse the Lacedemonians knew not what to think: for well they saw, that such a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to prevent it; but to keep the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was already done, than stood with their honour or profit; others held it the wisest way, having done so much, not to stick upon a little more, but rather by giving full satisfaction, to retain the friendship of that State, which was more to be valued than all the rest of Greece. This resolution prevailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens, with full commission to make an end of all controversies, did earnestly labour in the Councell-house, to make the truth of things appear, saying, That their Confederacy with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the recovery of Panactie: concerning which Town, or any other businesse, that it much grieved ved the Lacedæmonians, to see things fall out in such wise as might give to the Athenians cause of displeasure; but that all should be done which in reason might be required for making matters even between them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they desired that Pylus might be restored to them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argives might be called aside. Favourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather, because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all this fair likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the sudden, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedæmonian Embassadors, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citie, and advised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be known to the Commonaltie of Athens, lest the insolent multitude should thereupon grow peremptorie and yeeld to nothing, unlesse they could draw them to unreasonable conditions. The Embassadors beleeved him, and fashioned their tale in the assemblie of the people, as he had advised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing afforded, inveighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were come to Athens for no other purpose, than to hinder the people from strengthning themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argives and their Adherents to their own alliance, as (contrary to their own Oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would very hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedæmonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill been seconded, with good performance) were now so much incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadours, and the strong perswasions of Alcibiades, that little wanted of concluding the league with Argos. Yet for the present so farre did Nicias, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevail with them, that the businesse was put off, untill he himself, with other Embassadours, might fetch a better answer from Sparta.

It may also seem a great wonder, how so poor a trick of Alcibiades was able to carry a matter of so great importance, when the Spartan Embassadours might have cast the load upon his own shoulders, by discovering the truth: But the gravitie which was usually found in the Lacedæmonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a wit; and they might well have been thought untrusty men, had they professed themselves such as would say and un-say for their most advantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a sowre message to deliver at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedæmonians should take the pains to re-build Panactæ, and should immediately renounce their Alliance made with the Thebans; letting them understand, that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argives, and their adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no mind to forsake the Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to break out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the request of Nicias their honourable friend, who would not seem to have effected nothing) swear a-new to keep the Articles of the league between him and Athens. Immediately therefore upon return of the Embassadours, a new league was made between the Athenians, Argives, Mantineans, and Eleans, with very ample provision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedæmonians were passed over with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacie did bend it self chiefly against them, as in short while after was proved by effect.

At this time the Lacedæmonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could unto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselves recovered nothing of their own (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late Warre by misfortunes, than in sundry passages between them and the Athenians: to procure and keep whose Amitie, they had left sundry of their own friends to shift for themselves. Contrariwise, the Athenians by the treatie of peace, had recovered the most part of that which they lost in warre;

all their gettings they had retained; and were ſtrengthened by the acceſſe of new Confederates.

How the peace between Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

IT was not long ere the Argives and their fellowes had found buſineſſe wherewith to ſet the Athenians on work, and make uſe of this conjunction. For, preſuming upon the ſtrength of their ſide, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Sparta to defend. So, many acts of hoſtilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparta did (as principals) infeſt each the other; but came in collaterally, as to the aid of their ſeverall friends.

By theſe occaſions the Corinthians, Bœotians, Phocians, Locrians, and other people of Greece, began a-new to range themſelves under the Lacedæmonians, and follow their enſignes. One victorie which the Lacedæmonians obtained by their meer valour in a ſet battell, neer to Mantinæa, againſt the Argive-ſide, helped well to repair their decayed reputation, though otherwiſe it yeelded them no great profit. The civill diſſention ariſing ſhortly after within Argos it ſelf, between the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almoſt thrown down the whole frame of the new combination. For the chief Citizens getting the upper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded ſo farre as to renounce the amitie of the Athenians in expreſſe words, and forced the Mantinæans to the like. But in ſhort ſpace of time the multitude prevailing, reverſed all this, and having chaſed away their ambitious Nobilitie applied themſelves to the Athenians as cloſely as before.

Beſides theſe uprores in Peloponneſus, many aſſaies were made to raiſe up troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewiſe in Macedon, to the Athenians, whoſe forces and readineſs for execution, prevented ſome things, revenged other, and requited all with ſome proſperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell, and the Lacedæmonians growing wearie, they began to be quiet; retaining ſtill that enmitie in their hearts, which they had ſufficiently diſcovered in effects, though not yet breaking out into terms of open Warre.

§. VIII.

The Athenians ſending two Fleets to ſack Siracuſe, are put to flight, and utterly diſcomfited.

DUring this intermiſſion of open War, the Athenians re-entertained their hopes of ſubduing Sicil, whither they ſent a Fleet ſo mightie, as never was ſet forth by Greece in any Age before or after.

This Fleet was very well manned, and furniſhed with all neceſſaries to ſo great an expedition, All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades, Author of that voyage, and one of the Generalls of their Fleet, was driven to baniſh himſelf, for fear of ſuch judgement, as elſe he was like to have undergone among the incenſed people; partly by the invaſion which the Lacedæmonians made upon Attica, whileſt the forces of that State were ſo far from home. Hereunto was added the aid of the King of Perſia, who ſupplied the Peloponeſians with mony.

Neither was the ſucceſſe of things in Sicilia ſuch, as without help from Athens, could give any likelihood of a good end in that war. For although in the beginning, the enterpriſe had ſo well ſucceeded, that they beſieged Siracuſe, the chief Citie of all the Iland, and one of the faireſt Towns which the Greeks inhabited, obtaining the better in ſundrie battels by Land and Sea; yet when the Town was relieved with ſtrong aid from Peloponneſus, it came to paſs that the Athenians were put to the worſe on all ſides, in ſuch wiſe that their Fleet was ſhut up into the haven of Siracuſe, and could not iſſue out.

As the Athenian affairs went very il in Sicil, ſo did they at home ſtand upon hot terms, for that the Lacedæmonians, who had been formerly accuſtomed to make weariſome yearly journeys into Attica, which having pilled and forraged, they returned home; did now by counsell of Alcibiades (who seeking revenge upon his own Citizens, was fled unto them) fortifie the Town of Decelea, which was neer to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harry all the Country round about, and sometimes give alarme unto the City it self. In these extremities, the pervicous obstinacy of the Athenians was very strange, who leaving at their backs, and at their own doores, an enemy little lesse mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another fleet into Sicil, to invade a people no lesse puissant, which had never offended them.

It often happens, that a prosperous event makes foolish counsell seem wiser than it was, which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vain conceits Pallas was said to turn unto the best. But where unsound advice, finding bad proof, is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserable issue. This second Fleet of the Athenians, which better might have served to convey home the former that was defeated, after some attempts made to small purpose against the Syracusans, was finally (together with the other part of the Navie, which was there before) quite vanquished, and hard up into the haven of Syracuse, whereby the camp of the Athenians, utterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driven to break up, and flye away by land; in which flight they were over-taken, round, and quite overthrown, in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischief well deserved fell upon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophocles and Pithodorus Generals, formerly sent into that Ile, pretending that they had taken mony for making peace in Sicil, whereas indeed there was not any means or possibility to have made War. Hereby it came to passe, that Nicias, who had the chief command in this unhappy enterprise, did rather choose to hazzard the ruin of his Country by the losse of that Army, wherein consisted little lesse than all the power of Athens, than to adventure his own estate, his life, and his honour, upon the tongues of lunelesse accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his tryall resolved to condemn him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdome and necessity required it. For (said he) they shall give sentence upon us, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would give ear to any that would speak in our behalf, but altogether hearken to suspicious and vain rumors that shall be brought against us; yea those our Souldiers who now are so desirous to return in safety, will in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewd and insolent multitude.

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth; and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may be excused, since he had before his eys the injustice of his people, and had well understood that a wicked sentence is infinitely worse than a wicked fact, as being held a president and pattern whereby oppression beginning upon one, is extended as warrantable upon all. Therefore his fear of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily have over-mastered; but when afterwards the Army, having no other expectation of safety than the faint hope of a secret flight, he was so terrified with an Eclipse of the Moon, happening when they were about to dislodge, that he would not consent to have the camp break up till seven and twenty daies were past. His timorousnesse was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the power of the Heavens, and the course of Nature would be as unjust as his Athenians, or might pretend lesse evill to the slothfull, than to such as did their best. Neither doe I think that any Astrologer can allege this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise than as the folly of men did, by application, turn it to their own confusion. Had C. Cassius the Roman, he who slew Julius Caesar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retyring, the broken remainder of Crassus his Army defeated by the Parthian Archers, was advised, upon such an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sun were past the sign of Scorpio, he made answer, that he stood not in such fear of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heavens, than the nearer danger of Enemies upon earth, he made such a safe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a fair example to that good rule, ——Sapiens dominabitur astris.

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of means, deprives the Governours of understanding, when he intends evill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of unjust men is the ready mean to weaken the vertue of those who might have done them good.

Of the troubles whereinto the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Armie in Sicilia.

THe losse of this Armie was the ruin of the Athenian Dominion, and may be well accounted a very little lesse calamitie to that Estate, than was the subversion of the walls, when the Citie about seaven years after was taken by Lysander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced under their obedience, others held out; some for fear of greater inconvenience were set at libertie, promising only to be their good friends, as formerly they had been their Subjects; others having a kind of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very unseasonably, that the principall men of Athens, being wearied with the peoples insolencie, took upon them to change the forme of that Estate, and bring the government into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captains which were abroad, they caused them to set up the forme of an Aristocratie in the Towns of their Confederates, and in the mean time, some that were most likely to withstand this innovation, being slain at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismaid, that none durst speak against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but every man was affraid of his neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall fear the Majestie of Athens was usurped by four hundred men, who observing in shew the ancient form of proceeding, did cause all matters to be propounded unto the people, and concluded upon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were only such as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than only to approve and give consent: for whosoever presumed any further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murther. By these means were many Decrees made, all tending to the establishment of this new authoritie, which nevertheless endured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was in the Isle of Samos did altogether detest these dealings of the four hundred usurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of banishment, and by his assistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised to the Lacedemonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made unprofitable, through the slow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first been very well entertained in Sparta, whilest his service done unto that State was not grown to be the object of envie. But when it appeared that in Counsell and good performance he so far excelled all the Lacedemonians, that all their good successe was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principall Citizens wearie of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yeelded her self to the love of this Athenian, that among her inward friends she could not forbear to call her young child by his name. Hereupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discovering the Spartan treacherie, conveyed himself unto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, sweet conversation, and sound wit, that he soon became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roys affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings Treasures and Forces in those parts. Then began he to advise Tissaphernes, not so far forth to assist the Lacedamonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to help the weaker side, and let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsell he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the only Favourite of so great a Potentate) he played his own game, procuring his restitution. At length his banishment being repealed by the Armie, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the four hundred) he laboured greatly to reconreconcile the Souldiers to the Governours; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turn it upon the common Enemie. Some of the four hundred approved his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie whereof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, and partly for that themselves, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit themselves of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obtain peace of the Lacedæmonians, desiring chiefly to maintain both their own authoritie, and the greatness of their City, if they might: but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserve their own power, or safetie at least, than the good Estate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made sundry overtures of peace to the Lacedæmonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wavering multitude, especially considering that the City of Sparta was governed by an Aristocracie, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages between the four hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedæmonians, were kept as secret as might be. For the City of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repair their losses, was not inclined to make composition, from which upon juster ground the Enemy was much more averse, trusting well that the discord of the Athenians (not unknown abroad) might yeeld some fair opportunitie to the destruction of it self, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And upon this hope King Agis did sometimes bring his forces from Decelea to Athens, where doing no good, he received some small losses. Likewise the Navie of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the City, but seeing no likelihood of success, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have bin regarded, than in this their decayed estate. Yet it seems, without any disparagement to their wisedome, they should rather have forborn to present unto the Citie, or to the countries neer adjoyning, any terror of the war. For the dissention within the wals might soon have done more good than could be received from the fleet or army without, which indeed gave occasion to set the Citizens at unity, though it lasted not very long. The four hundred, by means of these troubles, were fain to resign their authority, which they could not now hold, when the people, having taken arms to repell forreign Enemies, would not lay them down, til they had freed themselves from such as oppressed the State at home. Yet was not this alteration of government a full restitution of the soveraign command unto the people, or whole body of the City, but only to five thousand; which company the four hundred (when their authoritie began) had pretended to take unto them as assistants: herein seeming to do little wrong or none to the commonalty, who seldom assembled in greater number. But now when the highest power was come indeed into the hands of so many, it was soon agreed, that Alcibiades and his companions should be recalled from exile, and that the army at Samos should be requested to undertake the government: which was forthwith reformed according to the Souldiers desire.

How Alcibiades won many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and again deposed.

THis establishment of things in the Citie, was accompanied with some good successe in the wars. For the Lacedæmonians were about the same time overthrown at Sea, in a great battell, by the Athenian Fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning such forces as he could raise, obtained many victories. Before the Town of Abydus, his arrivall with eighteen ships, gave the honour of a great battell to the Athenians; he overthrew and utterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedæmonians, commanded by Mindarus; took the Towns of Cyzicus and Perinthus, made the Selymbrians ransome their Citie, and fortified Chrysopolis. Hereupon letters were sent to Sparta, which the Athenians intercepting, found to contain the distresse of the Armie, in these few words: All is lost; Mindarus is slain; the Souldiers want victuals; we know not what to doe.

Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedæmonians in fight by land at Chalcedon, took Selymbria, besieged and won Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong City. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the Navie.

But this his honour continued not long, for it was taken from him, and he driven to banish himself again, only because his Lieutenant, contrary to the expresse command of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the Fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmful than the first, and the losse which thereupon they received, was (though more heavy to them, yet) lesse to be pitied of others, than that which ensued upon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought revenge upon his own Citie; now, as inured to adversitie, he rather pitied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should have repaired to their weak estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himself after injurie received. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the Fleet, he presented battel to Lysander the Lacedæmonian Admirall, who was not so confident upon his former victorie, as to undertake Alcibiades himself, bringing ships more in number (notwithstanding the former losse of fifteen) than his enemies had, and better ordered than they had been under his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Navie, then did Alcibiades with-draw himself to a Town upon Hellespont, called Bizanthe, where he had built a Castle.

§. XI.

The battell at Arginusæ, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captains by the people.

AFter this time, the Athenians receiving many losses and discomfitures, were driven to flye into the Haven of Mytelene, where they were straitly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessitie inforced them to man all their vessels, and to put the uttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battel. This battell was fought at Arginusæ, where Callicraditas, Admirall of the Lacedæmonians, losing the honour of the day, preserved his own reputation by dying valiantly in the fight. It might well have bin expected, that the ten Captains, who joyntly had command in chief over the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happy a victory, have received great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise, they were forthwith called home, and accused, as if wilfully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunk, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them up, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captains readily made a very just answer, That they pursuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, under sufficient men, to save those that were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arising about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse availed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who said, That he himself escaping in a meal-tub, had bin intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to desire of the people revenge of their deaths upon the Captains. It was very strange, that upon such an accusation maintained with so slender evidence, men that had well deserved of their Countrie should be overthrown. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolve them, save onely Socrates the wise and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Six of them were put to death, of whom one had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe relieved by other vessels in the storm: but the Captains which were absent escaped; for when the furie of the people was overpast, this judgement was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceived and perverted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamie of injustice, but the divine Justice was not a-sleep, nor would be so deluded.

§. XII.

§. XII.

The battell at Ægos-Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponneſian war,

THe Peloponneſian fleet under Lyſander, the year next following, having ſcowred the Ægean Seas, entred Helleſpont, where (landing ſouldiers) it beſieged and took the town of Lampſacus. Hereupon all the navie of Athens, being an hundred and fourſcore ſail, made thither in haſte, but finding Lampſacus taken before their comming, they put in at Seſtos, where having refreſhed themſelves, they ſailed to the river called Ægos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goats-Brook, or the river of the Goat, being on the continent oppoſite to Lampſacus: and there they caſt Anchors, not one whole league off from Lyſander, who rode at Lampſacus in the harbor. The next day after their arrival they preſented fight unto the Peloponneſians, who refuſed it, whereupon the Athenians returned again to Ægos-Potamos; and thus they continued five daies, braving every day the Enemy, and returning to their own harbor when it drew towards evening.

The Caſtle of Alcibiades was not far from the Navie, and his power in thoſe places was ſuch as might have greatly availed his countrimen, if they could have made uſe of it. For he had waged mercenaries, and making war in his own name upon ſome people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. Hee perceiving the diſorderly courſe of the Athenian Commanders, repaired unto them, and ſhewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not ſoon fore-ſee and prevent it. For they lay in a rode ſubject to every weather, neither neer enough to any town where they might furniſh themſelves with neceſſaries, nor ſo far off as had bin more expedient. Seſtos was the next Market-town; thither both Souldiers and Mariners reſorted, flocking away from the Navie every day, as ſoon as they were returned from braving the Enemie. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Seſtos, which was not far off, or at leaſt to conſider how neer their Enemie was, whoſe fear proceeded rather from obedience to their Generall, than from any cowardiſe. This admonition was ſo far deſpiſed, that ſome of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his own matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of date. Had it not bin for theſe opprobrious words, he could (as he told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedæmonians, either to fight upon unequal terms, or utterly to quit their fleet. And like enough it was that he might ſo have done by tranſporting the light-armed Thracians, his confederates, and others his Followers, over the Streights, who aſſaulting the Peloponneſians by Land, would either have compelled them to put to Sea, or elſe to leave their ſhips to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counſell no better than hath bin rehearſed, he left them to their fortune, which how evill it would be he did prognoſticate.

Lyſander all this while defending himſelf by the advantage of his Haven, was not careleſſe in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his maner was to ſend forth ſome of his ſwifteſt Veſſels after them, who obſerving their doings, related unto him what they had ſeen. Therefore underſtanding in what careleſſe fashion they romed up and down the country; he kept all his men a-boord after their departure, and the fift day gave eſpeciall charge to his Scours, that when they perceived the Athenians diſ-imbarking, as their cuſtome was, and walking towards Seſtos, they ſhould forthwith return, and hang up a brazen ſhield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lyſander being in a readineſſe, made all ſpeed that ſtrength of Oars could give, to Ægos-Potamos, where he found very few of his enemies aboord their ſhips, nor many neer them, and all in great confuſion upon the newes of his approach.

Inſomuch that the greateſt induſtrie which the Athenians then ſhewed, was in the eſcape of eight or nine ſhips, which knowing how much that loſſe imported, gave over Athens as deſperate, and made a long flight into the Iſle of Cyprus; all the reſt were taken, and ſuch of the Souldiers as came in to the reſcue cut in pieces. Thus was the war which had laſted ſeven and twenty years, with variable ſucceſſe, concluded in one hour, and the glory of Athens in ſuch wiſe eclipſed, that ſhe never afterward ſhone in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this victory, Lyſander, having taken ſuch Towns as readily did yeeld yeeld upon the first fame of his exploit, set sail for Athens, and joyning his forces with those of Agis and Pausanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the City; which finding too stubborn to yeeld, and too strong to be won on the sudden, he put forth again to Sea, and rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Towns of the Ionians as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselves to Sparta, he did thereby cut off all provision of victuals, and other necessaries, from the City, & inforced the people by meer famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long walls, leading from the Town to the Port, should be thrown down; That all Cities subject to their Estate, should be set at libertie; That the Athenians should be Masters only of their own Territories, and the fields adjoyning to their Town; And that they should keep no more than twelve Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedæmonians did, and follow the Lacedæmonians as Leaders in the wars.

These Articles being agreed upon, the walls were thrown down with great rejoycing of those who had born displeasure to Athens, and not without some consultation of destroying the City, and laying waste the Land about it. Which advice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirty Governours, or rather cruell Tyrants, appointed over the people, who recompenced their former insolencie and injustice over their Captains by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slaverie.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repair what their own folly had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants perceiving this, advertised the Lacedæmonians thereof, who contrived, and (as now domineering in every quarter) soon effected his sudden death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian war. After which the Lacedæmonians abusing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to Greece, and by combination of many Cities against them, were dispossessed of their high authoritie, even in that very age in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foil that they took was of the Thebans led by Epaminondas, under whom Philip of Macedon, father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was sundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haughtie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing, for the severall Estates and Signories of Greece, were grown so jealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lacedæmonians, Athenians, Argives and Thebans, which were the mightiest, associating themselves with the weaker partie, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one City could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so far as might make her terrible to her neighbours. And thus all parts of the Country remained rather evenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till such time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had been dependants, and followers, yea almost meer Vassals to the Estates of Athens and Sparta) found means, by making use of their factions, to bring them all into servitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romans presenting them with a shew of libertie, did themselves indeed become their Masters.

CHAP. IX.

Of matters concurring with the Peloponnesian Warre, or shortly following it.

§. I.

How the affaires of Persia stood in those times.

DUring the times of this Peloponnesian War, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably enjoyed a long reign over the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greek Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as usurpers, and for their short reign little to be regarded) place next unto them, or to Xerxes the second; who, and his brother Sogdianus after him (seeming to have have bin the sons of Hester) held the Kingdome but one year between them, the younger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to pursue the history of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearsall of all the particulars, otherwise than as they shall be incident to the affairs of Greece. It may therefore suffice to say, That Xerxes the second, being a vicious Prince, did perish after a month or two, if not by surfait, then by the trecherie of his riotous brother Sogdianus. Likewise of Sogdianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he slew unjustly Bagoazus a principall Eunuch, and would have done as much to his brother Darius the Bastard, had not he foreseen it, and by raising a stronger army than this hated King Sogdianus could leavie, seized at once upon the King and Kingdome. Darius having slain his brother, held the Empire nintteen years. Amyrtæus of Sais an Egyptian rebelled against him, and having partly slain, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himself so firmly with the Greeks, that by their aid he maintained the Kingdome, and delivered it over to his posteritie, who (notwithstanding the fury of their civill Wars) maintained it against the Persian, all the days of this Darius, and of his son Artaxerxes Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a Subject of his own, and of the Royall bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himself with the Athenians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell upon the Athenians in Sicil, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Ilanders and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage, It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedæmonians being destitute of mony, wherewith to defray the charge of a great navie, without which it was impossible to advance the war against the state of Athens, that remained powerfull by sea, were driven to crave his assistance, which he granted unto them, first upon what conditions best pleased himself, though afterwards the Articles of the league between him and them were set down in more precise termes; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make war joyntly upon the Athenians, and upon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly bin his, or his Predecessours, should return to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the war ensuing (of which I have already spoken) he recovered all that his grandfather and father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedæmonians, he got Amorges alive into his hands, who was taken in the citie of Iasus, the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Nevertheless Egypt still held out against him, the cause whereof cannot be the employment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece: for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions, but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold; which effected for him by Souldiers of other nations, and his naturall enemies, where the valour of his own Subjects was insufficient to perform. Darius had in marriage Parysatis his own sister, who bare unto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mnemon, that is to say, the Mindfull, or the Remembrer, who succeeded him in the kingdom, and Cyrus the younger, a Prince of singular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave unto his elder son Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous eye upon the doings of young Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, took more upon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to have taken some very sharp course with him, had not his own death prevented the comming of his younger son, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the war between these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall have occasion to speak somewhat in more convenient place.

§. II.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

I Hold it in this place very convenient to shew the proceedings of the Greeks, after the subversion of the walls of Athens, which gave end to that war called the Peloponnesian war, but could not free the unhappy Country of Greece from civill broils. The thirtie Governours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their law, and make a collection of such ancient Statutes, as were meet to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sudden alteration. To this charge was annexed the supreme authoritie, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessitie of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being uncertain, it was fit that such men should give judgment in particular causes, to whose judgment the Laws themselves, by which the Cause was to be ordered, were become subject. But these thirtie, having so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to deserve it by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them in trust.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellows as were odious to the Citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who considered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethink themselves, how easie a thing it would be unto these thirtie men, to take away the lives of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what else they listed, when condemnation without true triall and proof had been once well allowed. Having thus plausibly entred into a wicked course of government, they thought it best to fortifie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needs commit for the establishing of their authoritie. Wherefore dispatching two of their own companie to Sparta, they informed the Lacedæmonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keep the Citie free from all rebellious motions: to which purpose it behoved them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedæmonians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their own cost to maintain. This motion was well approved, and a Guard sent, the Captain of which was so well entertained by the thirty, that none of their misdeeds could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants began to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, invaded the principall men of the Citie, sending armed men from house to house, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely, or able to make any head against this wicked forme of government: whereby there was such effusion of bloud, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) seemed very horrible, and unable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discovered, caused his fellows to bethink themselves, and provide for their own securitie, and his destruction, lest he should make himself a Captain of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeem his own peace with their ruin. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens, whom they thought meetest, and gave unto them some part of publike authority, the rest they disarmed; and having thus increased their own strength, and weakned their opposites, they began a-fresh to shed the bloud, not only of their private enemies, but of such whose money or goods might inrich them, and enable them for the paiment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, upon whose goods he should seize, putting the owner to death. But when Theramenes uttered his detestation of so wicked intent, then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, & (wheras one main privilege of the three thousand was, that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but have the accustomed triall) he took upon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, & so reduced him under the trial & sentence of that order. It was wel alleged by Theramenes, that his name was not more easie to be blotted out of the catalogue, than any other mans, upon which consideration, he advised them all to conceive no otherwise of his case, than as of their own, who were liable to the same form of proceeding: but every man choosing rather to preserve his own life by silence, than presently to draw upon himself the danger, which as yet concerned him little, & perhaps would never come near him; the Tyrants interpreting silence as consent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drink poyson.

§. III.

The Conspiracie against the thirty Tyrants, and their deposing.

AFter the death of Theramenes, the thirtie began to use such out-rage, as excelled their former villanies. For, having three thousand (as they thought) firm unto them, they robbed all others without fear or shame, despoiling them of lands and and goods, & cauſed them to flie into baniſhment, for ſafeguard of their lives. This flight of the citizens procured their liberty, and the general good of the City. For the baniſhed citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into conſultation, and reſolved to hazzard their lives in ſetting free the City of Athens. The very thought of ſuch a practice had bin treaſon at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventie men, or thereabout, were the firſt undertakers, who with their Captain Thraſybulus took Phyla, a place of ſtrength in the Territorie of Athens. No ſooner did the thirtie hear of their exploit, than ſeek means to prevent further danger; aſſembling the three thouſand, and their Lacedemonian guard, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with ſome loſſe of their men repelled. Finding the place too ſtrong to be taken by aſſault, they intended to beſiege it; which purpoſe came to nought by means of ſnow that fell, and other ſtormie weather, againſt which they had not made proviſion. Retiring therefore to the City, which above all they were to make good, they left the moſt of their guard, and two companies of Horſe, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a dying ſiege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thraſybulus were increaſed from ſeventie to ſeven hundred, which adventured to give charge upon thoſe guards, of whom they cut off above an hundred and twentie. Theſe ſmall, but proſperous beginnings, added more to the number of thoſe in Phyla, who now with a thouſand men got entrance into Piræus, the ſuburb of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming the thirtie had reſolved to fortifie the Town of Eleuſine, to their own uſe, whereinto they might make an eaſie retrait, and ſave themſelves from any ſudden perill. It may well ſeem ſtrange, that whereas their barbarous maner of government had brought them into ſuch danger, they were ſo far from ſeeking to obtain mens good will, that contrariwiſe, to aſſure themſelves of Eleuſine, they got all of the place who could bear arms into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though under form of Juſtice) murthered them all. But, Scelerum tutum per ſcelera eſt iter, the miſchiefes which they had already done were ſuch, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparent likelihood of ſafetie, than by extending their crueltie unto all, ſeeing few or none were left, whom they could truſt. When Thraſybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were termed conſpirators, had taken the Piræus, then were the three thouſand armed again by the Tyrants, and brought to aſſault it; but in this enterpriſe Thraſybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom though there were ſlain to the number of ſeventie only, yet the victorie ſeemed the greater, becauſe Critias, and one other of the thirtie, periſhed in that fight. The death of Critias, and the ſtout defence of Piræus, together with ſome exhortations uſed by Thraſybulus to the Citizens, wrought ſuch effect, that the thirty were depoſed. Nevertheleſſe there were ſo many of the three thouſand, who having communicated with the thirtie in their miſdeeds, feared to be called to a ſharp account, that no peace, nor quiet form of government could be eſtabliſhed. For Embaſſadors were ſent to Sparta, who craving aid againſt Thraſybulus and his followers, had favourable audience, and a power ſent to their aſſiſtance, both by land and ſea, under the conduct of Lyſander, and his Brother, whom Pauſanias the Spartan King did follow, raiſing an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedemonians. And here appeared firſt the jealouſie, wherein ſome people held the State of Sparta. The Bœotians and Corinthians, who in the late wars had bin the moſt bitter enemies to Athens, refuſed to follow Pauſanias in this expedition; alleging that it ſtood not with their oathes, to make war againſt that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing indeed, leſt the Lacedemonians ſhould annex the Territorie of Athens to their own Demains. It is not to be doubted, that Pauſanias took this anſwer in good part. For it was not his purpoſe to deſtroy thoſe againſt whom he went, but only to croſſe the proceedings of Lyſander, whom he envied. Therefore having in ſome ſmall ſkirmiſhes againſt them of Thraſibulus his party, made a ſhew of war, finally wrought ſuch means, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and ſuch others, as were like to give cauſe of tumults, being ſent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, having withdrawn themſelves to Eleuſine, were ſhortly after found to attempt ſome innovation, whereupon the whole City riſing againſt them, took their Captains, as they were comming to Parly, and ſlew them; which done, to avoid further inconvenience, a law was made, that all injuries paſt ſhould be forgotten, and no man called into queſtion for wrongs committed. By which order, wiſely made, and carefully obſerved, the City returned to her former quietneſſe.

CHAP. X.

Of the expedition of Cyrus the younger.

The grounds of Cyrus his attempt against his brother.

THe matters of Greece standing upon such terms, that no one estate durst oppose it self against that of Lacedamon, young Cyrus, Brother to Artaxerxes King of Persia, having in his fathers life-time very carefully prosecuted the war against Athens, did send his messengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appear no less to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous war against the Athenians. To this request, being generall, the Lacedamonians gave a suitable answer, commanding their Admirall to perform unto Cyrus all service that he should require of him. If Cyrus had plainly discovered himself, and the Lacedamonians bent their whole power to his assistance, very like it is, that either the kingdome of Persia should have bin the recompence of his deserts; or that he perishing in battell, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forthwith ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew unto the Greeks the waies, which under the Macedonian Ensigns, the victorious foot-steps of their posteritie should measure; and opening unto them the riches, and withall the weaknesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both desire and hope of that conquest, which he reserved to another generation, than to give into their hands that mighty kingdom, whose hour was not yet come. The love which Paryſatis the Queen mother of Perſia bare unto Cyrus her younger son, being seconded by the earnest favour of the people, & ready desires of many principall men, had moved this young Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspire after the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as hath before bin shewed) whose meaning was to curb this ambitious youth, he found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so surely by the old Kings favour, that it were not safe to attempt any means of displacing him, by whose disfavour himself might easily lose the place of a Vice-roy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly be able to maintain his own life. The neerest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trechery, craft, & all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, using by the way all fair shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might wel be thought, that Queen Paryſatis had obtained the inheritance of that mighty Empire. And it was very true, that Paryſatis had used the best of her endeavour to that purpose, alleging that (which in former ages had bin much available to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was born whilest his father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was crowned king. All which not sufficing, when the most that could be obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoyning: then did this Tissaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaxerxes, of a dangerous treason intended against his person. Upon this accusation, whether true or false, very easily beleeved, Cyrus was arrested, and by the most vehement intreate of his Mother very hardly delivered, and sent back into his own Province.

§. II.

The preparations of Cyrus, and his first entrie into the War.

THe form of government which the Persian Lieutenants used in their severall Provinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made war and peace, as they thought it meet, not only for the Kings behoofe, but for their own reputation; usually indeed with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the more easily tolerated, because their own heads were held only at the Kings pleasure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his wil, whatsoever it were, or they could conjecture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himself, the interest that he had in the Kingdom; the small assurance of his brothers love, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the means which he had by love of his own people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedæmonians, whom he had bound unto him, to obtain the Crown for himself. Neither was it expedient that he should long sit idle, as waiting till occasion should present it self: but rather enterprise somewhat whilest yet his Mother lived, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than onely questionable. Hereupon he first began to quarrell with Tissaphernes, and seized upon many Towns of his jurisdiction, annexing them to his own Province, which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that he was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrels. But Tissaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, & cowardize despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiving that the Milesians were about to give up themselves into the hands of that young Prince, as many other towns of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preserve his reputation, and keep the town in his own hands. Wherefore he slew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing fair occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In levying Souldiers he used great policie; for he took not only the men of his own Province, or of the Countries adjoyning, whose lives were ready at his will; but secretly he furnished some Grecian Captains with money, who being very good men of war, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had secret instructions to prolong their severall wars, that the Souldiers might be held in continuall exercise, and ready in arms upon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to besiege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greeks, who very readily came over to his assistance, being thirteen thousand very firm Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Army, and that which he had levied before, he could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be imployed in the accomplishment of higher designs. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subject to the Persian, had invaded his Territorie, he raised the siege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leisure to rejoyce that Cyrus had left him to himself, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rovers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which cause taking a band of five hundred horse, he posted away to carry tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

§. III.

How Cyrus took his journey into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

THe tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Parysatis, the Queen-Mother, whom she called the Author and occasioner of the war. But whilest the King in great fear was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger hasted upon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his number much increased by the repair of his Countrimen, though most strengthned by the accesse of seven hundred Greeks, and of other four hundred of the same Nation, who revolted unto him from the King. How terrible the Greeks were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queen of Cilicia, who had brought him aid) he made in Phrygia; where the Greeks by his direction making offer of a charge upon the rest of his Army, which contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Camp (not perceiving that this was but a bravery) fled amain, the victuallers and baggagers forsaking their cabbins, & running all away for very fear. This was to Cyrus a joyful spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the ſame temper, and the more unlikely to make reſiſtance, becauſe they were preſt to the war againſt their will and diſpoſitions, whereas his Army was drawn along by meer affection and good will. Nevertheleſſe he found it a very hard matter to perſwade the Greeks to paſſe the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with the conceit of the tedious return. Therfore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to ſeek excuſes, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of the Kings principall Captains, and his own great enemy, lay by the River, againſt whom he requeſted them to aſſiſt him. By ſuch devices, and exceſſive promiſe of reward, he brought them to Euphrates; where ſome of the Greeks conſidering, That who ſo paſſed the River firſt, ſhould have the moſt thanks, and might ſafely return if the reſt ſhould refuſe to follow them; they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perſwaded to do as ſome had begun: and being allured by great hopes, they reſolved to ſeek out Artaxerxes, whereſoever he was to be found. The King in the mean time having raiſed an army of nine hundred thouſand men, was not ſo confident upon this huge multitude, as to adventure them in triall of a plain battail. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thouſand men, had under-taken to make good the Streights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a ſtrong wall, and other defences of nature and art, which made the place to ſeem impregnable, had quitted the paſſage, and retired himſelf toward the Kings forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face, who deſpairing to find any way by Land, had procured the Lacedæmonian fleet, by the benefit whereof to have tranſported his Army. I doe not find that this cowardiſe of Abrocomas, or his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Camp, till five dayes were paſt after the battail, received either puniſhment, or diſgrace; for they, toward whom he withdrew himſelf, were all made of the ſame metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of reuring to the uttermoſt bounds of his Kingdom, untill by Teribazus, one of his Captains, he was perſwaded not to abandon ſo many goodly Provinces to the enemy, who would thereby have gathered addition of ſtrength, and (which in the ſharp diſputation of Title to a Kingdom is moſt availeable) would have grown ſuperior in reputation. By ſuch advice, the King reſolved upon meeting with his brother, who now began to be ſecure, being fully perſwaded that Artaxerxes would never dare to abide him in the field. For the King having caſt up a Trench of almoſt fortie miles in length, about thirty foot broad, and eighteen foot deep, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing ſo ſafe, as to be far diſtant from his enemies.

§. III.

The battail between Cyrus and Artaxerxes.

THe Armie of Cyrus having overcome many difficulties of evill wayes, and ſcarcitie of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiving this great fear of Artaxerxes; and being paſt this trench, marched careleſſy in great diſorder, having beſtowed their Arms in Carts, and upon Beaſts of carriage; when on the ſudden one of their Vaunt-currors, brought news of the Kings approach. Hereupon with great tumult they armed themſelves, and had ranged their battails in good order upon the ſide of the river Euphrates, where they waited for the comming of their enemies, whom they ſaw not till it was after noon. But when they ſaw the cloud of duſt raiſed by the feet of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their neer approach how well they were marſhalled, comming on very orderly in ſilence, whereas it had bin expected, that ruſhing violently with loud clamours, they ſhould have ſpent all their force upon the firſt brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were ſo unequall in diſtent, being all embattailed in one body and ſquare, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Perſian manner) in the middeſt of his own, did not with the corner, and utmoſt point thereof, reach to the half breadth of Artaxerxes his battail, who carried a front proportionable to his number, exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greeks begin to diſtruſt their own manhood, which was not accuſtomed to make proof of it ſelf, upon ſuch exceſſive oddes. It was almoſt incredible, that ſo great an Armie ſhould be ſo eaſily chaſed. Nevertheleſſe, it quickly appeared, that theſe Perſians, having learned (contrary to their cuſtome) to give charge upon their enemies with silence, had not learned (for in was contrary to their nature) to receive a strong charge with courage. Upon the very first offer of onset, made by the Greeks, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amain, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hooks and sithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twenty) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping down, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his enemies gave so much confidence to Cyrus and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certainly, the Title had bin assured unto him that day, had not he sought how to declare himself worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiving that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him void, was about to encompasse the Greeks, and to set upon them in the reare, he advanced with six hundred Horse, and gave so valiant a charge upon a squadron of six thousand, which lay before the King, that he broke it, slaying the Captain thereof Artagerses with his own hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole troupe of six hundred, very few excepted, began to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus almost unattended, who perceiving where the King stood in troop, uncertain whether to fight, or leave the field, could not contain himself, but said, I see the man: and presently with a small handfull of men about him ran upon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the breast. Having given this stroke, which was his last, he received immediatly the fatall blow, which gave period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a dart, thrown by a base fellow, wherewith astonied, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was unpossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safetie; not caring afterwards for their own lives, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Master was slain. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to be forthwith stricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling upon the name of Cyrus, and desiring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troops, and utterly dismaied such Persian Captains, as were now, even in their own eys, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Camp of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned; from whence Artaxerxes making all speed, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greeks, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There he met with Tissaphernes, who having made way through the battail of the Greeks, was ready now to joyn with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the news, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, bin sufficient to countervaile all disasters received, the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greeks would have yeelded little comfort. For Tissaphernes had not slain any one man of the Greeks, but contrariwise, when he gave upon them, they opening their battail, drave him with great slaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the squadron of the Greeks. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greeks, as Masters of the field, gave chase to all that came in their sight, they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greeks, intending to set upon them in the rear. But these good Souldiers perceiving the Kings approach, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seek honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being pursued unto a certain Village, that lay under a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a bravery, than with purpose to attempt upon these bold fellows any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seem to have slain with his own hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this reputation he thought that he might now preserve well enough, shewing a manly look half a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaied on the top of a Spear. This ensign might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greeks espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neer them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discovering their approach, fled upon the spur; so that none remained in the place of battail, save only the Greeks, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no news of Cyrus, but thinking that he was pursuing the Army, they thought it was fittest for them, having having that day done enough, to return to their quarter, and take their Supper; to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had given them no leisure to dine.

§. V.

The hard estate of the Greeks after the fight; and how Artaxerxes in vain sought to have made them yeeld unto him.

IT was now about the setting of the Sun, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Camp spoiled, little or nothing being left that might serve for food: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their weary bodies with sleep. In the mean season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived that the baseneſſe of his people, and weakneſſe of his Empire, was now plainly discovered to the Greeks: which gave him assurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Army, should live to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signory. Wherefore he resolved, to try all means, whereby he might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carry tidings of that which he had seen: to which purpose he sent them a brave message the next morning; charging them to deliver up their Arms, and come to his Gates, to await there upon his Mercie. It seems that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, upon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that thought. For the Greeks being advertised that morning from Arieus, a principall Commander under Cyrus, that his Master being slain, he had retired himself to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from thence, whence intending to return into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would joyn with him, but resolving to stay no longer: they sent answer back to Arieus, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst resist them, they would place Arieus himself in the Kings Throne, if he would joyn with them, and pursue the victory. Before they received any reply to this answer, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Camp, whose errand seemed to the Captains very insolent: One told them, that it was not for the Vanquishers to yield their Weapons; another, that he would dye ere he yeelded to such a motion; a third asked, whether the King, as having the victory, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship, for then would they first know, with what courtesie he meant to requite their kindneſſe. To this question Phalinus a Grecian, waiting upon Tissaphenes, answered, That the King having slain Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdom, in the middest whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted strength to kill if they would hold up their throats; for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalinus, that having nothing left, but their Arms and Valour, whilest they kept their Armes, their Valour would bee serviceable; but should they yeeld them, it was to bee doubted, that their bodies would not long remain their own. Hereat Phalinus laughed, saying; This young man did seem a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deep speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Arms and Valour to prevaile against the great King. It seems that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imployed in a businesse of importance, thought himself too profound a States-man, to be checkt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisedom herein failed him. For whatsoever he himself was (of whom no more is known than that he brought an unhonest message to his own Countrymen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, and Lives, to the mercileſſe Barbarians) this young Scholar by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprised by treachery of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having never seen the wars before, undertook the conduct of the Army, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promised to be faithfull to the King, as they had bin to Cyrus, offering their service in Egypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have use of them. But the finall answer was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the King good as Friends, nor defend themselves from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus delivered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they then were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence; Whereunto he required their answer. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (saith Phalinus) must I understand you? As choosing peace if we stay, or otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace, quoth this politique Embassadour? To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you, and so dismissed him, no wiser than he came. All that day the Greeks were faine to feed upon their Horses, Asses, and other Beasts, which they rosted with Arrowes, darts, and woodden targets, thrown away by the Enemies.

their

§. VI.

How the Greeks began to return home-wards.

AT night they took their way towards Arieus, to whom they came at mid-night; being forsaken by four hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled over to the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not find. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces; for had they been kindly used, it may well bee thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, & served as Stales to draw in the rest. Arieus being of too base a temper, and birth, to think upon seeking the Kingdome for himself, with such assistance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make covenant with them for mutuall assistance unto the last: Whereunto both parts having sworn, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should bee somewhat longer, yet safer and fitter to relieve them with victuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a weatisome march, and tyred the Souldiers, they found the Kings Army which had coasted them, lodged in certain Villages, where they purposed themselves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because he would not seem by declining them to shew fear, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath considered their former behaviour, Nor strange, that the Grecians, being weary and hungry, and lying among enemies in an unknown Country, should bee very fearfull: but it is almost past beliefe, that the noise which was heard of these poor men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to do, should make the Persians flie out of their Camp, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should crave peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Artaxerxes, desiring free accesse for Embassadours, to intreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the quality of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to run over the generall passages of those times, than to dwell among circumstances. But surely it is a point very remarkable, That when Clearchus had willed the Messengers to bid the King prepare for battell, because the Greeks (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to hear of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxerxes dissembling the indignity, was contented sweetly to swallow down this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plenty of victuals to relieve them.

How Tissaphernes, under colour of peace, betrayed all the Captains of the Greeks.

HItherto the Greekes, relying upon their own vertue, had rather advanced their affairs, than brought themselves into any straights or termes of disadvantage. But now came unto them the subtile Fox Tissaphernes, who circumventing the Chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischievously entrap them, to the extreme danger of the Army. He told them, that his Province, lying neer unto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their deliverance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrimen at home, would not bee unthankfull for such a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearse the great service that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not onely brought him a good strength of men, but in the day of battell shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Camp, and gave chase to the Barbarians that stood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth he) did I allege to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you safe into Greece, in which sute I have good hope to speed, if you will send a milde answer to him, who hath willed me to ask you, for what cause ye have borne Arms against him. The Captains hearing this, were contented to give gentle words, which Tissaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly, as he said) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were, That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for that they took, and committing no spoil: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to afford them an open Market. Hereupon both parties having sworn, the League was concluded, and Tissaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all businesse, came unto them again after twenty dayes, and then they set forward. This interim of twenty dayes, which Tissaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of mistrust to his new Confederates. For besides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breed doubt, the Brethren, and Kindred of Arieus, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldierr, did work him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that he daily grew more strange to the Greeks than formerly he had bin. This caused many to advise Clearchus, rather to passe forward as well as he might, than to rely upon covenants; and sit still whilest the King layed snares to entrap them. But he on the contrary perswaded them, to rest contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselves again into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting withall their own wants, and the Kings means, but especially the Oathes mutually given and taken, wherewith hee saw no reason why the enemy should have clogged himself if hee meant mischief, having power enough to do them harm by a fair and open Warre.

Tissaphernes was a very honourable man (if honour may be valued by greatnesse and place in Court) which caused his Oath to be the more esteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or base respect, was like to have drawn it from him. But his falshood was such, both in substance and in successe, as may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the fountain of Truth, I hate a rich man a lyer. A lye may find excuse when it growes out of fear: for that passion hath his originall from weaknesse. But when Power, which is a Character of the Almighty, shall be made the supporter of untruth, the falshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his own strength against the divine Justice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly produceth lamentable effects, and is followed with sure vengeance. It was not long ere Tissaphernes found means to destroy all the Captains, whom he subtilely got into his power by a train; making the Generall Clearchus himself the mean to draw in all the rest. The businesse was contrived thus: Having travelled some dayes together in such wise, that the Persians did not encamp with the Greeks, who were very jealous of the great familiarity appearing between Tissaphernes and Arieus; Clearchus thought it convenient to root out of Tissaphernes his brains all causes of distrust, whereof many had grown in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, he rehearsed the oath of Confederacie, which had past between them, shewing how religiously he would keep it; and repeating the benefits, which the Greeks did receive by the help of Tissaphernes, he promised that their love should appear to him not unfruitfull, if he would make use of their service against the Mysians or Pisidians, who were accustomed to infest his Provinces; or against the Egyptians, who were then Rebells to the great King. For which cause hee desired him, that whereas all divine and humane respects had linked them together, hee would not give place to any close accusation or suspition, whereby might grow sudden inconvenience to either of them, upon no just ground. The faithlesse Persian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred fair occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore hee told Clearchus, that all this was by him wisely considered, wishing him further to call to mind how many wayes hee could have used to bring them to confusion, without perill to himself, especially by burning the Country, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needs needs have perished by meer famine. For which cause he said that it had bin great folly, to seek by perjurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were already in his hands. But the truth was, that his own love to them had moved him to work their safetie, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted, of pleasures that might redound to himself, and the King, by their assistance; but for that hee might by their friendship, hope to obtain what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he invited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captains with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tissaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by secret information sought to raise dissention between them. Clearchus himself being thus deceived, with great importunity drew all the chief Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repair with him to the Camp of Tissaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers, as it had been to some common Fair. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the five principall Collonels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a signe was given, upon which they within were apprehended, and the residue slain. Forth-with certain bands of Persian Horsemen scoured the field, killing as many Greeks as they met, and riding up to the very Camp of the Graecians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had been done. Hereupon the Greeks took Arms in haste, thinking that the enemy would forth-with have assailed their Camp. Anon they might perceive the Embassadors of Tissaphernes, among whom were his own brother, and Arieus, followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Army, saying, that they brought a message from the King, which Arieus delivered to this effect: That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the league made, was justly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the five Collonels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honoured, and finally, that the King required them to surrender their Arms, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his servant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed upon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadors, that if Clearchus had in such sort offended, it was well that hee was in such sort punished: but he willed them to send back Menon and Proxenus, whom they had so greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greeks might be advised how to answer the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadours knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other four were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were stricken off. I hold it not amisse to prevent the order of time, annexing to this perfidiousnesse of Tissaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greeks, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aid of men and mony, he did so ill manage his affairs, that neither subtiltie, nor perjury (to which he failed not to have recourse) availed him; finally, the King was jealous of his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who took it from his shoulders. Such was the recompence of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not doe, he was thought upon private ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flie from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let us return to the prosperity, wherein he triumphed without great cause, having betrayed braver men than himself, and intending to bring the like mischief upon the whole Armie.

§. VIII.

How Xenophon heartened the Greeks, and in despight of Tissaphernes went off safely.

GReat was the heavinesse of the Souldiers, being now left destitute of Leaders; and no lesse their fear of the evill hanging over their heads, which they knew not well how to avoid. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deep sadnesse of the whole Army to be such as hindred them from taking any course of preventing the danger at hand, began to advise the underunder-officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had been, to bethink themselves of some mean, whereby their safety might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: setting before their eyes whatsoever might serve for to give them hope, and above all, perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous enemies.

Hereupon they desired him to take upon him the charge of that Regiment, and so together with him, the same night calling up such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeed in the places of those who were slain, or taken. This being done, and order set down for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the losse of Tissaphernes his assistance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than he had been wont to sell them; To which purpose they intended to take up their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceed, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made upon them by Tissaphernes, whom they, serving all on foot, were not able to requite for the harm which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greeks could reach. For this cause did Xenophon provide slings, wherewith he over-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses fit for service, that were employed among the carriages, he set men upon them; training likewise his Archers to shoot compasse, who had been accustomed to the point blank. By these meanes did he bear off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gave them chase with that band of fifty Horse, which being well backt with a firm body of footmen, and seconded with troups of the light-armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemy to lie aloof. Tissaphernes not daring to come to handy-gripes with these resolute men, did possesse the tops of mountains, and places of advantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all such difficulties, he betook himself to that course, which was indeed the surest, of burning the Countrie. With great sorrow did the Greeks behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some advised to defend the Country, as granted by the enemy himself to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to doe that which was the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsell was, that being neer unto the Carduchi, a people enemy to the Persian, they should enter into their Country, passing over some high mountains which lay between them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them, if Tissaphernes had begun sooner to cut off their victuals, rather than to seek to force, or to circumvent them by his fine wit.

The difficulties which the Greek Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

ENtring upon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountered with many difficulties of wayes, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselves against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferiour to the Greeks in daring, but onely in the Art of Warre. They were very light of foot, skilfull Archers, and used the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Country were of much use against these poor travellers, afflicting them in seven dayes which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Between the Territorie of these Carduchi, and the parts of Armenia confining them, ran Centrites a great River, upon which the Greeks refreshed themselves one day, rejoycing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would prove easie. But the next morning they saw certain troops of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were levied by the Kings deputies in those parts; Tissaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broad and deep, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers, the Carduchi, following upon them, lay on the side of a Mountain, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discover a Foord, by which the greater greater number of them passing over, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending back the most expedite men, gave succour to the Rear-ward, against which the Carduchi being sleightly armed, could not on plain ground make resistance hand to hand. These Carduchi seem to have inhabited the Mountains of Niphates, which are not far from the Spring of Tygris, though Ptolomy place them far more to the East upon the River of Cyrus in Media; wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded upon his own knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Towns, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a conjecture, which may endure the severity of a Critike. For Ptolomy, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: only of this last, I think it the same which falleth into Tygris, not much above Artasigeria, springing out of Niphates, and running by the Town of Sardeva in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greeks having passed Centrites did arrive.

How Teribazus Governour of Armenia, seeking to entrap the Greeks with termes of feined peace, was disappointed, and shamefully beaten.

THe Army finding in Armenia good provision, marched without any disturbance about fifty or threescore miles to the heads of the River Tygris, and passing over them, travailed as far further without resistance, till they were encountred by Teribazus at the River Teleboa, which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small, but Ptolomy and others omit it. Teribazus governed that Country for the Persian, and was in great favour with Artaxerxes, whose Court may seem to have bin a School, where the Art of falshood was taught as wisedom. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made upon this condition, That they should take what they pleased, but not burn down the Towns and Villages in their way. As soon as he had made this league, he levyed an Army, and besetting the Streights of certain Mountains which they were to passe, hoped well to make such benefit of their security, as might give him the commendation of being no lesse craftily dishoneſt than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greeks to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking relief. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was revealed. Hereupon the Greeks, taking this captive with them for a guide, sought him out; and comming upon his Camp, did so affright him, that before the whole Army could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They took his Pavilion, wherein (besides many slaves, that were Artificers of voluptousnesse) very rich furniture was left by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Army went Northward, and passing Euphrates, nor far below the springs thereof, travailed with much difficulty through deep snow, being followed aloof by the enemy, who durst not approach them, but did cut off such as they found straggling behind. The Inhabitants of the Country, through which they marched, had their wintering houses under ground, wherein was found great plenty of victuals, and of Cattail, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, & taken sufficient ease after the miserable journey, which had consumed many of them with extreme cold, they departed, leading with them many bond-slaves, & taking away (besides other Horses and Cattail) some Colts that were bred up for the great King.

§. XI.

The passage of the Army to Trabyzonde, through the Countries bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other obscure Nations.

SO without impediment they came to the River Phasis, neer whereunto the people called Phasiani, Tacchi, and Chalybes were seated. These Nations joyned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountains, which the Greeks were were to passe, made countenance of war: but some companies being sent by night to seize upon a place of equall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused their people to flye, every one retiring to the defence of his own. The first upon whose Countrie the Greeks did enter were the Tuetbi, who conveying all their provision of victuals into strong holds, brought the Army into much want, untill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great store of Cattail were taken; the people, to avoid captivity, threw themselves head-long down the rocks, the very women throwing down first their own children, and then casting themselves upon them. Here was taken a great bootie of Cattail, which served to feed them, travailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very stout Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greeks hand to hand, killing as many as they took prisoners, and cutting off their heads, which they carried away, singing and dancing, to the great grief of their companions living; who were glad, when after seven dayes journey they escaped from those continuall skirmishes, wherewith they had bin vexed by these Barbarians. Hence travailing through a good corn-Countrie, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Scythini, they came to a rich Town, the Lord whereof, and of the Region adjoyning, used them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountain, whence they might discover the Euxine Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Town) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, desiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five dayes march, they came to a Mountain called Teches, being (as I think) a part of the Mountains called Moschici, whence their guide shewed them the Sea, towards which they bent their course: and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by means of an interpreter, found among themselves, who born in that place had bin sold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Colchos, wherein stands the Citie of * Trabisond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greeks. The Colchi entertaining them with hostility, were requited with the like; for the Army having now good leisure to repose themselves among their friends the Trapezuntians, did spoyl the Country thirty dayes together, forbearing onely the Borderers upon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

§. XII.

How the Army began at Trabizond to provide a Fleet, wherewith to return home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Synope, and there prosequuted the same purpose.

HAving now found an Haven Town, the Souldiers were desirous to take shipping, & change their tedious Land-journies into an easie Navigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedæmonian, one of the principall Commanders, promised by means of Anaxibus the Lacedæmonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would provide Vessels to embark them. Having thus concluded, they likewise took order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to use them for their navigation. Lest all this provision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Army, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adjoyning to clear the wayes, and make an easie passage for them by Land, whereunto the Souldiers were utterly unwilling to give eare, being desirous to return by Sea: but the Countrie, fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xenophons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them sailed directly into Greece, forsaking their Companions, who had put them in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabizonde: the other took Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were stayed to increase the fleet. After long aboad, when victuals began to fail, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neer unto the Camp, was already quite wasted, they were fain to embark their sick men, with the women, children, and such of the baggage as might best be spared, in those few ships which they had already provided. The rest of the Armie took their way by Land to Cerasus, a Greek Town, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Army being mustered, was found to consist of eight thousand & six hundred men. From hence they passed through the Country of the * Mosynaci, who were divided into factions. The stronger partie despising their friendship, caused them to joyn them with the weaker whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was [b] Cotyora, a Greek Town likewise, and a Colonie of the Synopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainment which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market afforded to them, nor the sick men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Town by force, and (committing no outrage) bestowed those which were sick in convenient lodgings, taking into their own hands the custody of the Gates. Provision for the Army they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territory of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Town. These news were unwelcome to [c] Sinope, whence Embassadours were sent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatning to joyn with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That meer necessity had enforced the Army to teach those of Cotyora good manners in so bad a method: letting them know, that he feared not to deal with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it self, to which, if cause were given, they would lend assistance. Upon this answer the Embassadors grew better advised, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Town of Cotyora to relieve the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promised to assist them with shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prove, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which crossed their way. This good counsail, and the fair promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Army, which well perceived, that the City of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It was therfore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serve to imbark every one of them, then would they not put from the shore.

§. XIII.

Of dissention which arose in the Armie; and how it was embarked.

HItherto the danger of enemies, and miseries of weather and wants, had kept the companie in firm unity; which now began to dissolve and to thaw, by the neighbouring air of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were sent as Agents from the Camp, remained at Sinope, Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, & the opportunity of the coast whereon they lay, thought it would be an honourable work to build a City in those parts, which were soon like to prove great and wealthie, in regard both of their own puissance, and of the great repair of the Greeks into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrie, divining of his successe by the entrails of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom he imployed had received a great reward of Cyrus, for conjecturing aright, that Artaxerxes would not give battail in ten dayes: he therefore, having preserved his money carefully, was desirous to be soon at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpose of Xenophon was divulged, which was interpreted according to the diversitie of mens opinions, some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heraclea, being informed of this consultation, were sore afraid, lest the povertie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintain themselves at home, should give facilitie to the project. Which to prevent, they promised to supply the Army with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered mony to some of the Captains, who thereupon undertook to give the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set sail for Greece. One of these Captains being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Troas; another offered to lead them into Chersonesus. Xenophon, who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions, and professed openly that he would have them to set forward, & hold together in any case, punishing him as a traitor that should forsake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their journies end. Silanus the Sooth-sayer, who had uttered Xenophons purpose, was hereby staied from out-running his fellows, and driven to abide with his wealth among poor men, longer than stood ſtood with his good liking. Alſo the other Captains were much troubled and affraid, when they perceived, that ſhips were prepared ſufficient for their Navigation, but that the money promiſed to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heraclea, knowing that the Armie was now reſolved for the voyage, and that Xenophon, whom they feared, had perſwaded them to this reſolution, thought it the wiſeſt way to furniſh them with a Navie, whileſt they were in good readineſſe, to depart, but to keep the mony to themſelves. The Captains therefore, who being diſappointed by theſe towns, found themſelves in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with fair hopes, repented much of their fair offers, and ſignifying as much to Xenophon, prayed him to make propoſition to the Armie, of taking the ſhips, & ſayling to Phaſis, where they might ſeize upon Lands, and plant themſelves in ſuch wiſe as ſhould ſtand beſt with their good liking. But finding him cold in the buſineſſe, they began to work the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the reſt. Theſe news becomming publike, bred a ſuſpition of Xenophon, as if he had won the reſt of the Captains to his purpoſe, and meant now to carry the Army quite another way from their own home. Wherefore aſſembling the Companies, he gave them ſatisfaction, and withall complained of ſome diſorders, which he cauſed them to redreſſe. A generall inquiſition was likewiſe made of offences committed ſince the death of Cyrus, which being puniſhed, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embaſſadours from Corylas Lord of the Paphlagonians, who ſending preſents, deſired peace of the Greeks: the Embaſſadours were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have bin ſought, for that the Greeks, having now their fleet in a readines, did ſoon weigh Anchors, and ſet ſail for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cheriſophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admiral Anaxibius, who promiſed to give the Army pay as ſoon as they came into the parts of Greece.

§. XIV.

Another great diſſenſion and diſtraction of the Army. How the mutiners were beaten by the Barbarians, and reſcued by Xenophon.

THe neerer that they approached to Greece, the greater was their deſire to make proviſion for themſelves, that they might not return home emptie-handed. Wherefore truſting well that if the charge of the Armie were abſolutely committed to one ſufficient man, he might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determined to make Xenophon ſole Commander of all; in whoſe favour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earneſt and violent. But he, either fearing to diſpleaſe the Lacedæmonians, who were jealous of him already (being incenſed by that fugitive who forſook the army at Trabizond, flying with one of their two ſhips) or moved by ſome tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatned ill ſucceſſe to his government, procured vvith vehement contention, that this honour vvas laid upon Cheriſophus a Lacedæmonian. It ſeems that Xenophon, conſidering the vexation incident to the conduct of a voluntary Army, wanting pay, did wiſely in yeelding to ſuch tokens as forbad him to accept it: eſpecially, knowing ſo well their deſire, which was, by right or by wrong, to get wealth wherſoever it might be found, without all regard of friend or foe. Cheriſophus had bin Generall but ſix or ſeven dayes, when he was depoſed, for having bin unwilling to rob the Town of Heraclea, which had ſent preſents to the Camp, and bin very beneficiall unto them in lending ſhips for their tranſportation. Two daies they had ſailed by the coaſt of Aſia, when being paſt thoſe great rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where conſulting how to take their way onwards, whether by Land or Sea, one ſeditious man began to put them in mind of ſeeking to get ſomewhat for themſelves, telling them that all their proviſion would be ſpent in three dayes, and that being now come out of the enemies Country, victuals and other neceſſaries could not be had without money; for which cauſe he gave advice to ſend meſſengers into the Town of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to underſtand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thouſand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which ſum amounteth to two thouſand and five hundred pound ſterling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the ſum raiſed to ten thouſand Cyzicens at leaſt: which to require, they thought Cheriſophus, as being generall the fittest man; others had more desire to send Xenophon: but in vain, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Lest therefore either of these should fall in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudency and lesse discretion were sent, who in such wise delivered their insolent message, that the Citizens taking time to deliberate upon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Town, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the Wals. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their ravenous purpose, they fell to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betrayed them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians and Achæans, they forsook immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, chusing new Leaders out of their own number. Above foure thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captains drave into the Port of Calphe, which is in the mid-way between Heraclea and Byzantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the sudden. With Cherisophus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one thousand and foure hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foot, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and forty horse, which small band had done good service already, and could not have bin spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Byzantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promised to bring some Gallies to convey him over into Greece; for which cause he took his way thither by Land, leaving to Xenophon such shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed upon the confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Asiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Country to the Propont. The Mutiners who had landed at Calphe by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Companies, every Captaine leading his own Regiment into some Village, five or six miles from the Sea; in the greater Towns were two Regiments quartered: and so was that part of the Country surprised on the sudden, and sacked all at one time. The place of Rendevous was an high piece of Ground, where some of them arrived, finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger: two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaped, the rest were all put to the sword. For the Thracians which had slipt at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raise the Country, and finding the Greeks loaden with booty, took the advantage of their disorder, cutting in peeces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thracians had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retrait from these Arcadians and Achæans, who wanting the assistance of horse, and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to stand meerly upon their defence, bearing off with greater danger, & many wounds received, the Darts and Arrows of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven frō their watering place, and enforced to crave parley. Whatsoever the Articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all, but pledges for assurance they would give none, without which the Greeks well knew, that all promises of such people, especially so incensed, were nothing worth. In the mean time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Travellers, whether they knew ought of any Grecian Army, passing along those parts: & receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly thrown themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides, them who gave him the intelligence. His horse-men he sent before to discover, & to scowr the waies; the light armed foot-men took the hill tops on either hand, all of them setting fire on whatsoever they found combustible: whereby the whole Country seemed to be on a light flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that some huge Army had approached. That night he encamped on a hill, within five mile of the Arcadians, encreasing still the number of his fires, which he caused hastily to be quenched soon after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainly that he would have fallen upon them in the dark, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early in the next morning Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to have given battell, found that his device, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but he marvelled that the Greeks were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquiry, that they removed at break of day, & perceived by signes that they had taken the way to the Port of Calphe, in which journey he overtook them. They embraced him and his, with great joy: confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that he should have come by night; wherein finding themselves deceived, they were affraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened away to overtake him, and joyn with him. So they arrived at the Haven of Calphas, where it was decreed, That whosoever from thenceforth made any motion to dis-joyn the Army, should suffer death.

§. XV.

Of divers pieces of service done by Xenophon; and how the Army returned into Greece. The occasions of the War between the Lacedæmonians and the Persians.

THe Haven of Calphas lay under a goodly head-land, that was very strong, and abounding with all kind of Grain and Fruits, except Olives. There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient Sea for a great City. All which commodities that might have allured the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should find some device to have settled himself and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to live at home; neither did they so much for hope of gain follow Cyrus in that War, as in regard of his Honour, and the love which they bare unto him: the poorer sort were such as left their Parents, Wives, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to return. But, whether it were so that Xenophon found advantage by their own superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrails, did indeed forbid their departure; so long they were inforced to abide in the place till victuals failed; neither would the Captaines lead them forth to forrage the Country, untill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more provision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronel into the place of Cherisophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoil of some Villages that stood near at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Country lying in wait to intrap him, and an Army of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythinian Thracians, which troups falling upon the Greeks that were scattered abroad in seeking booty, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certain Mountain there by. The news of this overthrow comming to Xenophon, he led forth a part of the Army to the rescue of those that survived, and brought them safe to the Camp; upon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, slew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemy, together with the present condition of the Army, so disheartened and unfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greeks to remove their Camp to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of such as were least able to endure travell, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to bury those which were lately slain, and to abate the pride of the Thracians, and their assistance. In this journey his demeanour was very honourable. For having given buriall to the dead, the Enemy was discovered, lying on the tops of the hils adjoyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backs a wood scarce passable) he marched directly, telling his men plainly, that he had rather follow the enemy with half the number, than turn his back to them with twice as many; & letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarians, he would not fail with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the camp, yet what should they do there, wanting victuals to sustain them in the place, and ships to carry them away? Wherefore he willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than another day fasting; and not to regard the uneasie return, which might serve to stay Cowards from runing away, but to wish unto the Enemy a fair and easie way, by which he might flye from them. These perswasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrey forthwith, removing their Families, and leaving all that could not suddenly be conveighed away, to the discretion of the Greeks, who at good leasure gathered the Harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the side of Asia. For they were not only suffered quietly to enjoy the spoyl of the Country, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colony on the Port of Calpas, Embassadors were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best assistance. But the Souldiers had no mind to stay. Wherefore entring further into Bythinia, they took a great booty, which they carried away unto Chrysopolis, a city near unto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly fear, lest their long stay in that Country might breed in them a desire to visite his Province, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he sent to the Lacedæmonian Admirall, entreating him with much instance and large promises to waft them over into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending, promised to give the Souldiers pay, as soon as they arrived at Byzantium. So were they carried out of Asia at the intreaty of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their lives to his discretion. How discourteously they were intreated by Anaxibius, and how to requite his injurious dealings, they seized upon Byzantium, which by Xenophons perswasion they forbare to sack; I hold it superfluous to relate. For the residue of their doings appertain little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asia, and stir up the Greeks to think upon greater enterprises, than ever their forefathers had undertaken. Likewise it was the only remarkable action which the time afforded. For the Roman Wars did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Towns of Italy; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedæmonians ruling insolently, but without disturbance. True it is, that the seeds of the War shortly following, which the Lacedæmonians made upon Artaxerxes, were already sown, before these companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Towns of Ionia which had sided with young Cyrus against Tissaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell, which they thought safer, than to fall into the hands of Tissaphernes, who was now appointed Lieutenant both of his old Province, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians besought the Lacedæmonians to send them ayd, whereby to recover their liberty; and obtained their request. For a power was sent over, under conduct of Thimbro a Spartan, who bestowed his men in such Towns as had already revolted, to secure the Cities and their Fields, but not to make any offensive War.

CHAP. XI.

Of the affairs of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedæmonians.

How the Lacedæmonians took courage by example of Xenophons Army, to make War upon Artaxerxes.

IT seems that the Lacedæmonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes took their favour shewed unto his brother, and yet were timerous in beginning an open war against him, thinking it sufficient to take all care that no advantage might slip, which could serve to strengthen their Estate, by finding the Persian work beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Army had revealed the baseness of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselves had gotten, upon termes of extreme disadvantage; then was all Greece filled with desire of undertaking upon this huge unwieldy Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Susa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon; and further, finding no power that was able to give them resistance, in all that long journy of four and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty five furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about four thousand two hundred fourscore and one, a very painfull march of one year and three months. Nevertheless, the civill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torn, and especially that hot fire of the Theban war, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth suddenly into a great flame, drew back out of Asia the power of the Lacedæmonians, to the defence of their own Estate; leaving it questionable, whether Agesilaus having both the same and far greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two years, which he spent in Asia, his deeds procured more commendation of magnanimity and fair behaviour, than of stout courage, and great, or profitable atchievements. For how highly soever it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other wars, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying near the Sea, carrying no proportion to Xenophons own journy, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with six thousand men from Aquileia, to his own Country, through all the breadth of Italy, and length of France, in despite of the Emperour Theodosius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agesilaus and his wars in Asia and Greece, we shall speak more in due place.

§. II.

The prosperous beginnings of the War in Asia.

Thimbro receiving Xenophons men, began to take in Towns, and to entertain all such as were willing to revolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had been highly beholding to the King; who seem to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live under the government of Tissaphernes, whom all others did as vehemently hate, as the King his Master did love him. The managing of the war begun by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaved himself as a good man of War, and a wise Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Asia was divided between Pharnabazus and Tissaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chief command in those Wars against the Greeks; Dercyllidas, who did bear a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischievous nature, and would not be sorry to see his Corrivall throughly beaten, though to the Kings losse) made an appointment with Tissaphernes, and forthwith entred Æolis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Province in few dayes, he brought into his own power.

That Country of Æolis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration, which gave easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had bin Deputy to Pharnabazus in those parts, after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein she behaved her self so well, that she not only was beloved of the people under her government; but enlarged her Territory, by the conquest of certain Towns adjoyning; and sundry times gave assistance to Pharnabazus in his Wars against the Mysians and Persians. For she had in pay some Companies of Greeks, whose valour by her good usage, did her great service. But somwhat before the arrival of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Son-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom she trusted and loved much, being blinded with ambition, found means to stifle her, and kill her son of seventeen years old; which done, he seized upon two of her principall Towns, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have been admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denyed entrance by her Souldiers that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Governour in the place of Mania. His presents were not onely rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foul treason threatned, whereby the wicked villain was driven into termes of almost utter desperation. In the mean time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Towns of Mania, that held against Midias, did quickly open their Gates. One onely Town stood out four dayes (against the will will of the Citizens, who were covetous of liberty) the Governour ſtriving in vain to have kept it to the uſe of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities, Gergethe and Scepſis, which the Traytor held, who fearing all men, as being loved of none, ſent Embaſſadours to Dercyllidas, deſiring leave to ſpeak with him, and pledges for his ſecurity: upon the delivery of which, he iſſued out of Scepſis, and comming into the Camp, made offer to joyn with the Greeks upon ſuch conditions as might ſeem reaſonable. But he was plainly told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to ſet the Citizens freely at liberty. And preſently upon theſe words they marched toward Scepſis. When Midias perceived that it was in vain to ſtrive againſt the Army, and the Townſ-men, who were all of one mind; he quietly went along with Dercyllidas, who remaining but a few hours in the City, did a ſacrifice to Minerva, and then leading away the Garriſon of Midias, he left the City free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midias did not forſake his Company, but followed him, earneſtly intreating that he might be ſuffered to retain Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they ſhould be opened; for (quoth Dercyllidas) I muſt here likewiſe doe a ſacrifice to Minerva. The Traytor, not daring to make deniall, cauſed his Mercenaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking poſſeſſion of the place, tendred pay to the Garriſon, who did not refuſe to ſerve under his Enſignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were ſeized upon, as belonging to one that had been ſubject to Pharnabazus, who was enemy to the Greeks: and ſo the murderous wretch was ſent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World he might find any place to hide his deteſted head. Dercyllidas having in eight dayes taken nine Cities, purpoſed for the eaſe of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end he took Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any deſire of Warre. That Winter, and the Summer enſuing, the truce being continued, held; in which time, beſides the waſting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Main, was fortified, being four or five miles in breadth; by which means eleven Towns, with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incurſions of the wilde Thracians, and made fit and able to victuall the Camp. Likewiſe the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great ſtrength, and very well ſtored with proviſion. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to divert the Warre into Caria, where was the ſeat of Tiſſaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not uneaſie to recover all the Towns of Ionia; Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yearly office, being appointed to joyn with him. Though it was manifeſt that Tiſſaphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of neceſſity, yet was he not in his own danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus having reſpect to the Kings ſervice, came to aſſiſt his private enemy Tiſſaphernes, and ſo paſſing into Caria, they thruſt Garriſons into all places of ſtrength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to find the Towns ill manned for reſiſtance. As theſe Perſians were deſirous to keep the Warre from their own dores, ſo was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the ſpoil and danger of the War, by transferring it into Caria. For which cauſe he paſſed the River of Meander, and not looking to have been ſo ſoon encountred, marched careleſly through the Country: when on the very ſudden the whole Army of Tiſſaphernes and Pharnabazus was diſcovered, conſiſting of Perſians, Carians, and ſome Mercenary Greeks, who were all marſhalled in very good order to preſent battell. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readineſſe, as alſo in advantage of ground: for the Perſian had a great multitude of Horſe, the Greek very few and feeble, being to fight in an open plain. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Islanders and others, of ſuch places as bordered upon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themſelves to preſent flight; or abiding a while for ſhame, did plainly diſcover by their looks, that they meant not to be more bold than wiſe. Onely Dercyllidas with his Peloponneſians, regarding their honour, prepared to endure the fight, which muſt needs have brought them to deſtruction, if the counſell of Pharnabazus had been followed, who perceiving the opportunity of ſo great a victory, was not willing to let it ſlip. But Tiſſaphernes, who naturally was a coward, ſeeing that countenance of reſiſtance was made, began to conſider what ſtrange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had ſhewed, and thinking that all the Greeks were of the like reſolution, held it the wiſeſt way to crave parley; the concluſion of which was, That a Truce ſhould be made, to laſt untill Tiſſaphernes might receive anſwer from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own liberty and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. This Treaty was of none effect; only it served to free the Greeks from the present danger, and to gain time unto Tissaphernes, who desired to avoid the War by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to finish by tryall of a battell.

How the Lacedæmonians took revenge upon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

IN the mean season the Lacedæmonians, who found none able to withstand them in Greece, began to call the Eleans to accompt for some disgraces received by them during the late Warres, when leasure was wanting to the requitall of such petty injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympiaque games, had set a fine upon the City of Sparta, for Non-payment of which, they forbad them to come to the solemnity; and publiquely whipt one of them that was of note, for presuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta from doing sacrifice to Jupiter; and in all points used great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking revenge: and therefore sent a peremptory message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at liberty the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the usuall pretence which they made the ground of all their Wars: though little they cared for the liberty of such Towns, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meer Vassals of the Lacedæmonians. In their late Wars with Athens, the strong opposition which they found, caused this goodly Title of liberty to work very slowly: but having now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present successe to their desires. Two years together they sent an Army into the Country of the Eleans: the first year an Earth-quake (held in those times a prodigious sign, and which did alwayes forbid the prosecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second year, all the Towns of the Eleans did hastily revolt, and the City it self was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their liberty, and to have her own Walls thrown down. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming use modestly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greeks were assistant to the Lacedæmonians, excepting the Corinthians and Bœotians, whose ayd having been of as much importance in the late Peloponnesiap War, as the force of Sparta it self, they could not smother their dislike of their unequall division following the victory; which gave to Sparta the command of all Greece; to Thebes and Corinth, onely security against Athens, but such a security as was worse than the danger. For when the equall greatnesse of two mighty Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutrall Common-weals to adhere to either, as the condition of their affairs required; but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred prosecuted the Warre to extremity, leaving the one City naked of power and friends, the other mightily increased in both; it was then (if not necessary to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made, yet) foolish and dangerous to provoke it. Nevertheless, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victory or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

The passage of Agesilaus into Asia. His Warre with Tissaphernes. How Tissaphernes was put to death; and the Warre diverted into another Province, through perswasion and gifts of Tithraustes his successour. How careless the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

AGesilaus newly made King of Sparta, was desirous to have the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected upon those of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Army to joyn with that of Dercyllidas, he took his way in great pomp to Aulis in Bœotia, a Haven lying opposite to the Iland of Eubœa; in which place Agamemnon (leading the power of all Greece to the War against Troy, many Ages before) had imbarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon, he meant also to do sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Country, would not permit, but saying, that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged unto their Officers; they were so unable to conceal their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw down his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agesilaus to entangle himself and his Country in a new Warre; therefore waiting better opportunity of revenge, he quietly swallowed the contumely, and followed his main intendment. Having landed his men at Ephesus, he was entertained by Tissaphernes with a Treaty of peace, wherein Agesilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Towns in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answer to his good liking, if he would in the mean while make Truce. Truce was therefore made, which Tissaphernes had sought, only to win time of making provision for the War, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes, whilest Agesilaus was busie in setling the estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sea. The end of this long vacation from war was at the comming down of these forces which Artaxerxes had sent: at what time Agesilaus received a plain message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forthwith depart out of Asia, or make good his abode by strong hand. Agesilaus returning word, that hee was glad to hear that his enemies had by perjury deserved vengeance from heaven, prepared to invade them; and sending word to all the Towns which lay between him and Caria, that they should provide victuals & other necessaries for his Army, did easily make Tissaphernes beleeve, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tissaphernes dwelt, and which was unfit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Persian had most confidence. Therefore Tissaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his Horse into the plains of Maander, hoping thereby to stop the passage of a heavie foot-army, not suffering them to passe into that Country which was fittest for their service. But the Greeks left him waiting there in vain, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they took great spoyl without resistance, till such time as the Horse-men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish having the better of the Greeks, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephesus. Although in this last fight only twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiving by that tryall how hard it would be to prevail, and hold the mastery of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, took all possible care to increase that part of his forces. By which means having enabled himself, whilest Winter lasted, he entred upon the Country of Tissaphernes, as soon as the season of the year would permit, and not only took a great booty, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plain of Maander, without assistance of their infantery, he gave them battell, and had a great victory, taking their Camp, in which he found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heavie upon Tissaphernes, who either upon cowardise had absented himself from the battell, or following some other businesse, was then at Sardis. For which cause his Master having him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much desired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greeks, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tissaphernes, and succeed him in the government. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last, through too much over-weening of his own wisedome, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himself most perfect; for supposing

Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treaty; which were on the one part, That all the Greeks in Asia might enjoy their own liberty and lawes; but contrariwise on the other side, That the Lacedæmonians should depart Asia, and leave the Towns to the Kings pleasure. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heaven, when by perjury he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last, through too much over-weening of his own wisedome, even in that part of cunning wherein he thought himself most perfect; for supposing poſing, that by his great skill in ſubtile negotiation he ſhould one way or other circumvent the Greeks, and make them wearie of Aſia; he did not ſeek to finiſh the war, and according to his Maſters wiſh, bring all things ſpeedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might find ſome opportunitie of making ſuch end as beſt might ſtand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it ſeems that he much miſtook his Princes diſpoſition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aid which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would he much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found ſuch meanes whereby the danger it ſelf might have been avoided: as not loving to have war, whileſt by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtain peace. And this appeared well by the courſe which Tithrauſtes took at his firſt poſſeſſion of the low Countries. For he ſent Embaſſadors to Ageſilaus, in very friendly ſort, letting him know, that the man who had been Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleaſure to let the Greeks enjoy their own lawes and liberte, upon condition, that they ſhould pay him the tribute accuſtomed, and the Armie be forthwith diſmiſſed. The anſwer to this propoſition, was by Ageſilaus referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the mean ſeaſon he was content to transferre the war into the Province of Pharnabazus, at the requeſt of Tithrauſtes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a ſtrange manner of War, both on the offenſive, and on the defenſive part. For Ageſilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquiſhing the great King, was contented to forbear his ſeveral Provinces, at the entreaty of the Lieurenants: and thoſe Lieutenants being employed by the King to maintain his Eſtates againſt all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might eaſily be taken from their ſhoulders) were little offended at any loſſe that fell on their next Neighbour-Princes, which were ſubject likewiſe to the ſame Crown of Perſia, ſo long as their own government could be preſerved from waſte and danger. The cauſe of this diſorder on the Perſian ſide, I can aſcribe to nothing ſo deſervedly, as to the corrupted eſtate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and miniſters of pleaſure, were able, by partiall conſtruction, to countenance, or diſgrace, the actions of ſuch as had the managing of things abroad; and to that fooliſh manner of the Kings (which was ſo uſuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or puniſh the Provinciall Governour, according to the benefit or loſſe, which the Country, given in charge unto each of them, received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to paſſe, that as every one was deſirous to make his own Territorie yeeld a large increaſe to the Kings treaſure, ſo no man was carefull to aſſiſt his borderers, if loſſe or danger might thereby grow to himſelf and his, but ſate ſtill as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not been uneaſie to recompence the ſpoyl of one Countrie, by conquering another, or defending a third from far greater miſeries.

§. V.

The War and Treatie between Ageſilaus and Pharnabazus.

Ageſilaus having thus compounded with Tithrauſtes, entred Phrygia, burning and waſting the Country without reſiſtance. He took the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant drave him out of the Camp. Theſe Actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their luſtre, were more glorious than profitable. For he did not win Cities and Places of ſtrength, which might have encreaſed his power, and given aſſurance to the reſt of his proceedings: but purchaſed fame and high reputation, by which he drew unto him ſome that were diſcontented and ſtood upon bad termes with the great King; whom he loſt again as eaſily, by meanes of ſome ſleight injury done to them by his under-Captains. Pharnabazus did not encloſe himſelf in any Town, for fear of being beſieged, but kept the field, lying as neer as he could ſafely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpoſe to fight, but to make ſome good end by compoſition, which he found not uneaſie to doe. For the pleaſures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their moſt neceſſity, had been ſo great, that when he (obtaining parley) did ſet before their eyes his bounty towards them, and his love, which had been ſuch, that beſides many other hazzards of his perſon, he had for the reſcue of their fleet when it was driven to run a-ſhore at Abydus, advenadventured to ride into the Seas as far as he could find any ground, and fight on horseback against the Athenians) together with his faith which had never been violated in word or deed: they knew not how to excuse their ingratitude, otherwise than by telling him, That having War with his Master, they were inforced against their will, to offend him. Agesilaus did make a fair offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them, they would maintain him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Country wherein he was at that time onely Deputy to Artaxerxes. But Pharnabazus told him plainly, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make war against them, he would not fail to do the best that he could as their enemy; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey another, he would then shift side, and betake himself to their alliance. The issue of this parley was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor again return into it, whilest employment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agesilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appease Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessary businesse elsewhere; but because his Country would yeeld great booty, and for the hire of thirty Talents. By this means the Lacedæmonians changed an honourable Friend into a hot Enemy, who afterwards requited their unthankfulnesse with full revenge.

§. VI.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were hired with gold from the Persian.

IN the mean while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agesilaus meant nothing lesse than to return into Greece, and let Artaxerxes rest quietly in Asia, took a wise course, whereby the Citie of Sparta was not onely driven to look to her own, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had been gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained unto the narrow bounds of her own Territory. He sent into Greece fifty talents of silver, to be imploied in raising war against the Lacedæmonians; which treasure was by the subtle practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed among the principall men of the Thebans, Argives and Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly born secret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much, as of open war. And lest this great heat of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercise, begin to faint and vanish away in idle words, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedæmonians into Armes, that they themselves might seem Authors of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the Thebans had in former time layd claim; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater favour, had it adjudged unto them, and received yearly mony for it. This mony the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recovering a great deal more than their own; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an invasion made upon Phocis, wasting that Country in the maner of open war. Such were the beginnings of professed hostility between Thebes & Sparta, & the first breaking out of their close enmity, that had long time, though hardly, bin cõcealed. For when the Phocian Embassadors came to Sparta complaining of the violence done by the Thebans, & requesting succour, they had very favourable audience, & ready consent to their sute; it being the manner of the Lacedæmonians to defer the acknowledgment of injuries received, until occasion of revenge were offered, & then to discover their indignation in cold bloud. At this time they had very good opportunity to work their own wils, having no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no news that could offend or trouble them. Wherefore they sent Lysander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forces as he could levie, to attend the comming of Pausanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath bin shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, & being of great reputation in those parts he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Pausanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians (who refused to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to joyn with Lysander, & make a speedy end of the war. The consideration of so great a danger, approaching so swiftly, caused the Thebans to seek what help they could abroad, for as much as their own strength was far too little to make resistance against such mightie preparations. It was not unknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedæmonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst utter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little available, considering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should do as little hurt as they could: by which maner of tergiversation, the Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the safest course to procure the assistance of some Estate that might presently declare it self on their side, which would cause many others to follow the example, and make their party strong. To this end they sent Embassadours to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall war, and recompenced with friendship lately shown in their refusall of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalf of the thirtie Tyrants against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their own Honour sake, they requested them of aid in the present war, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to her former estate and dignitie. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only refuse to aid the Lacedæmonians in this War; but that it should assist the Thebans, and engage it self in their cause. Whilest Pausanias lay still, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates; Lysander being desirous to doe somewhat that might advance the businesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where though Pausanias did not meet him, as had been appointed, yet he attempted the Town, and was slain in fight by the Thebans, who came hastily to the rescue. As this victorie did incourage the Thebans, so the comming of Pausanias with his great Armie did again amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were soon revived by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the late battell, Pausanias durst not hazzard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slain, by composition, departed out of their Territorie; for which, either cowardise or indiscretion, he was at his return to Sparta condemned as a Traitor, and driven to flie into Tegea, where he ended his daies in banishment.

How Agesilaus was called out of Asia to help his Country. A victory of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian assisted by Pharnabazus, overcomes the Lacedæmonian Fleet; recovers the mastery of the Seas, and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

THis good successe, and the confederacy made with Athens, gave such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argives, Corinthians, Eubœans, Locrians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith side with them, and raising a strong Army, determined to give battell to the Lacedæmonians as near as they might, to their own dores; Considering that the force of Sparta it self was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiving the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obeyed them, and promising his friends in Asia to return speedily to their assistance, passed the Streights of Hellespont into Europe. In the mean time the Cities of the new league had given battell to the Lacedæmonians, and the remainder of their Associats; but with ill successe. For when the right wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argives and Thebans returning from the chase in some disorder, were broken and defeated by the Lacedæmonians, who meeting them in good order, won from them the Honour which they had gotten by forcing the left wing of the Lacedæmonians, and made the victory of that day entirely their own. The reporters of this battell meeting Agesilaus at Amphipolis, were by him sent over into Asia, wherein it is not likely that they brought much comfort unto his friend, who had since his departure seen the Spartan Fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admirall slain. The same man, whose endeavour had brought the Athenians into order by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedæmonians with money, and all manner of supplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew ſtrong at Sea, when the Citie was diſpoyled of her old reputation, & ſcarcely able to maintain an Army by Land for her defence. Phranabazus conſidering how much it imported the king his Maſter, to have the Greeks divided into ſuch factions as might utterly diſable them from undertaking abroad, thought it the ſafeſt way for himſelf, during theſe broiles, to take ſuch order, that he ſhould not need any more to ſeek peace by intreaty and commemoration of old benefits, at their hands, who unprovoked, had ſold his love for thirty Talents. To which purpoſe he furniſhed Conon the Athenian with eight ſhips, who had eſcaped when the Fleet of Athens was ſurprized by Lyſander at Ægos-Potamos; giving him the command of a great Navie, wherewith he requited the loſſe received at Ægos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedæmonians with the like deſtruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victory Conon ſailed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberality of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victory, ſo ſtrong a Navie, and ſo much Gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their Wals, and think more hopefully upon recovering the Signiory which they had loſt.

§. VIII.

Of ſundry ſmall victories gotten on each part. The Lacedæmonians loſe all in Aſia; the Athenians recover ſome part of their old Dominion.

NEvertheleſſe, the Lacedæmonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for ſome years the honour of their Eſtate, endangered very greatly by this loſſe at Sea. For Ageſilaus obtained the better with his horſe-men from the Theſſalians, who were accounted the beſt riders in Greece. He waſted Bœotia, and fought a great battell at Coronea againſt the Thebans and their Allies, whom he overthrew; and by his Marſhall Gylis forraged the Country of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gain of theſe victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many loſſes much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battell of Coronea vanquiſh the Orchomenians, who ſtood oppoſite unto them, and retired unbroken to Mount Helicon, opening way perforce when Ageſilaus charged them in the return from the purſute. Likewiſe Gylis was ſlain with a great part of his Army by the Locrians; and ſome other exploits by the Lacedæmonians performed againſt the Corinthians, were repayed with equall dammage received in the parts adjoyning; many Towns being eaſily taken, and as eaſily recovered. The variety of which enterfeats was ſuch, that the Thebans themſelves were drawn by the loſſe of the haven of Corinth, to ſue for peace, but could not get audience, till ſuch time as the newes came of a great victory obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian forces at Lechæum; whereupon the Theban Embaſſadors being ſent for, and willed to doe their meſſage, required only in ſcorn, to have a ſafe conduct given them, that they might enter into Corinth. From this time forward the War was made for a while only by incurſions, wherein the Achæans, Confederates of Sparta, felt moſt loſſe, their whole State being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrary ſide, untill Ageſilaus repayed theſe invaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought upon their own Lands, which did ſo afflict the Acarnanes, that they were driven to ſue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of moſt conſequence, upon which the ſucceſſe of all depended. For when the Towns of Aſia perceived that the Lacedæmonians were not only intangled in a hard War at home, but almoſt diſabled to paſſe the Seas, having loſt their Fleet at Cnidus, they ſoon gave ear to Pharnabazus, who promiſed to allow that they ſhould uſe their own lawes, if they would expell the Spartan Governours. Only the City of Abydus did ſtand firm, wherein Dercyllidas lay, who did his beſt to contain all the Towns about Helleſpont, in the Alliance of the Lacedæmonians; which he could not do, becauſe the Athenian Fleet under Thraſybulus, took in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, reducing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

The base conditions offered unto the Persian by the Lacedæmonian. Of sundry fights and other passages in the Warre. The peace of Antalcidas.

ABout this time the Spartans began to perceive how uneasie a thing it would be to maintain the War against men as good as themselves, assisted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craved peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering not only to renounce the Greeks inhabiting Asia, and to leave them to the Kings disposition, but withall to set the Ilanders, and every Town in Greece, as well the little as the great, at full and absolute liberty, whereby they said that all the principall Estates of their Country would be so weakened, that no one, nor all of them should be able to stir against the great King. And sure it was, that the power of the Country being so broken and rent into many small pieces, could neither have disquieted the Persian, by an offensive War, nor have made any good defence against him, but would have left it easie for him in continuance of time to have taken the Cities one after another, till he had made himself Master of all. The Spartans were not ignorant of this, but were so carried with envie, that perceiving how the dominion of the Seas was like to return to Athens, they chose rather to give all from themselves and others, and make all alike weak, than to permit that any of their own Nation should grow stronger than themselves, who so lately had commanded all. Yet this great offer was not at the first accepted, both in regard that the other Estates of Greece, who had in the Kings behalf joyned together against the Lacedæmonians, did by their severall Embassadors oppose themselves unto it; and for that it was thought safest for Artaxerxes rather to weaken the Lacedemonians yet more, than by interposing himself to bring friends and foes on the sudden to an equality. Especially Struthas, whom Artaxerxes had sent as his Lieutenant into the low Countries, did seek to repay the harm done by Agesilaus in those parts: which his intent appearing plain, and all hope of the peace being thereby cut off, Thimbro was sent into Asia to make Warre upon Struthas; and others were appointed to other places, whereby the War being scattered about, all the Iles and Towns on the firm Land, grew almost to the manner of Pyracy and Robbery, affording many skirmishes, but few great actions worthy of remembrance. Thimbro was slain by Struthas, & in his place Diphridas was sent, who demeaned himself more warily. Dercyllidas was removed from his charge at Abydus, because he had not impeached Thrasybulus in his enterprises about Hellespont; Anaxibius, who succeeded him, was surprised and slain in a skirmish by Iphicrates the Athenian. Thrasybulus departing from Lesbos toward Rhodes, was slain by the way at Aspendus. The City of Rhodes had long before joyned with the Lacedæmonians, who erected there (as was their manner) an Aristocratie, or the Government of a few the principall Citizens; wheras contrariwise the Athenians were accustomed to put the Soveraignty into the hands of the people, each of them seeking to assure themselves, by erecting in the town of their Confederates a government like unto their own: which doing (where more especiall cause did not hinder) caused the Nobility to favour Sparta, and the Commons to encline to Athens. The people of Ægina roved upon the coast of Attica, which caused the Athenians to land an Army in Ægina, and besiege their Town: but this siege being raised by the assistance of the Lacedæmonian fleet, the Ilanders began a-new to molest Attica, which caused the Athenians to man their ships again, that returned beaten, having lost four of thirteen. The loss of these ships was soon recompenced by a victory which Chabrias the Athenian Generall had in Ægina, whereupon the Ilanders were fain to keep home, and leave to the Athenians the Seas free. It may well seem strange that the Citie of Athens, having but newly raised her wals, having not by any fortunate and important battell secured her estate from dangers by land, but only depending upon the assistance of such Confederats, as carried unto different ends, had often discovered themselves irresolute in the common cause, would send a fleet and an army to Cyprus, in defence of Evagoras, when the mastery of the Seas was so ill assured, that an Iland in the eie of Pyræus, had ability to vex the coast of Attica. But as the over-weening of that City did cause it usually to embrace more than it could compasse; so the insolency and shameless injustice of the people, had now bred in the chief Commanders, a desire to keep themselves far out of sight, and to seek employments at such distance as might secure them from the eies of the envious, and from publike judgments, out of which few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Ile of Lesbus; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carry away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrie could well have spared: with which he returned not, when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new adventures in Egypt; whereby arose neither thanks to himself, nor profit to his Citie, though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careless of things at hand, had a notable blow given unto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, even within their own Haven. For Teleutias, a Lacedæmonian, being made Governour of Ægina, conceived a strong hope of surprizing the Navie of Athens, as it lay in Peræus; thinking aright that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twentie lying in harbour, whose Marriners were asleep in their Cabbins, or drinking in Taverns. Wherefore he sailed by night into the mouth of the Port, which entring at the break of day, he found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, and few or none left aboord to make resistance: by which means he took many ships laden with merchandizes, many fisher-men, passengers, and other Vessels, also three or four Gallies, having sunk or broken, and made unserviceable, as many of the rest as the time would suffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings daughters given to him in marriage, with whom he lived about the Court; and many officers that favoured the Lacedæmonians were placed in the lower Asia, by whose assistance the Fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellespont, in such wise, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before; giving freedome to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Countrie into as many severall States as were pettie Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes having bought his own peace with money, did likewise by his money become Arbitrator and decider of Controversies between the Greeks, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his own good. The Tenor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his own; the Iles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus be subject to Athens; all other Greek Towns, as well the little as the great, be set at libertie; and that whosoever should refuse this peace, upon them the approvers of it should make war, the King assisting them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their losses at Sea, the Lacedæmonians by revolt of their confederates, and the necessitie of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted mony; and other States by the miseries of the war, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent unto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedæmonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Argives to depart out of Corinth (which under pretence of defending they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Bœotia, of which Province Thebes had always held the government, the Thebans themselves being also comprehended under the name of the Bœotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw down their own Citie, and to dwell in villages: alleging that they had formerly bin accustomed so to do, though purposing indeed to chastise them, as having been ill affected to Sparta in the late War. By these courses the Lacedæmonians did hope that all the small towns in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their wars, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be unable to make opposition.

The war which the Lacedæmonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason; and Olynthus by famine.

WHilst these wars, which ended without either victory or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was grown so mighty, that she did not only command her neighbour Towns, but was also become terrible to places far removed, and to Sparta it self. Great part of Macedonia, together with Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the usuall pretence of the Lacedæmonians, to set at liberty the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselves. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia being neareſt unto the danger of those incroaching neighbous, acquainted the Lacedæmonians with their fear, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would be too strong for all Greece, if continuance of time should give it reputation, which onely it wanted: wherefore they requested assistance, but in such termes as did sound of compulsion, protesting that either they must war upon Olynthus, or become subject unto her, and fight in her defence. Hereupon was made a hastie levie of men, two thousand being presently sent away, with promise to be seconded by a greater Army. Whileſt these two thousand gave such beginning to the war, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Army following them, surprized the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betrayed into the hand of Phœbidas the Lacedæmonian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the slavery of their Country. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any point violated the peace lately made between them; which caused the Lacedæmonians to doubt whether this act of Phœbidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment. In conclusion, profit so far over-weighed honestie, that the deed was approved, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, many driven into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the government of the citie: by whose authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serve the Lacedæmonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This accesse of power having strengthened the Lacedæmonians, caused them to entertain the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battell, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it self unto their obedience.

§. XI.

After this Olynthian War, which endured almost three years, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found a means to shake off their yoak, and gave both example and means to others to doe the like. One of the banisht men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for fear of it were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was laid between these two, that soon found very good successe, being managed thus. Seven of the banished men forsook Athens privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the evening to the Gates like husband-men returned from work, and so passed undiscovered unto the house of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawn into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemn feast being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promised the Governours, who were insolent and lustful men, that he would conveigh unto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Town, with whom they should take their pleasure. Having cheared them with such hope and plentie of good wine, he told them when the time of performance (which they urged) came, that he could not make good his promise, unlesse they would dismisse their followers, because the Gentlewomen, who attended without the Chamber, would not endure that any of the servants should see their faces. Upon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maids, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loose behaviour, slew them all upon the sudden with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then presently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where feigning themselves to come to the Governours upon businesse, they got admittance, and likewise slew those which were of the Lacedæmonian faction. By the like device they broke into the prison, slew the Gaoler, & set at liberty such as they thought meet; and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captain of the Castle hearing the sudden Proclamation, thought the Rebels to be stronger than indeed they were: the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a pra-

a practice to discover such as would be forward upon occasion of revolting. But as soon as day-light revealed the plain truth, all the people took armes and besieged the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aid unto the Towns adjoyning, whence a few broken troups comming to the rescue, were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speed to assist their Countrimen, but procured some Athenians to joyn with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citie, that the Castle was yeelded, more through fear than any necessitie, upon condition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the Captain at his return to Sparta was put to death. When the news of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forthwith, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that Citie, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had bin taken from the Lacedæmonians, and not a town perfidiously usurped by them, restored to her own libertie. Cleombrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who having wearied his followers with a tedious Winters journie, returned home without any good or harm done, leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Armie, at Thespies, to infest the Thebans; who doing them some displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt upon the Haven of Athens, which failing to take, he wasted the countrie adjoyning, and drave away Cattel, causing by this outrage the Athenians to enter with all their power into the war, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how they might possibly with-draw themselves.

Chap. XII.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battell of Leuctra, to the battell of Mantinæa.

§. I.

How Thebes and Athens joyned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battell of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

THe Lacedæmonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravitie in all their proceedings; but one dishonourable rule they held, That all respects withstanding the commodity of Sparta were to be neglected; the practice of which doctrine, even by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate: but when it was put in execution by insufficient over-weening men, it seldom failed to bring upon them in stead of profit unjustly expected, both shame and losse. And so it befell them in these enterprises of Phœbidas, upon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias upon the Piræus. For, howbeever Agesilaus did spoyl the Countrie about Thebes, in which he spent two Summers, yet the diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good successe of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise began to look abroad, saylng to the Isle of Corcyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea prevailed, began, as in the Peloponnesian War, to surround Peloponnesus with a Navie; afflicting so the Lacedæmonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied their friends, and caused them to seek for peace, it had bin very likely that the end of this war, should have soon come to a good end, which nevertheless, being prosequuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the Citie of Sparta as much dejected, as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiving how Thebes encroached every day upon her weak Neighbours, not sparing such as had bin dependants upon Athens, and finding themselves, whilest engaged in such a war, unable to relieve their complaining friends, resolved to settle the affairs of Greece, by renewing that form of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily signifying, That it was their intent to finish the War, to which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadors along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treatie of peace: which came to passe, being so wrought by the courageous wisdom of Epaminondas, who understood far better than his Countrimen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedæmonians and Athenians did soon agree; but when the Thebans offered to swear to the Articles in the name of the Bœotians, Agesilaus required them to swear in their own name, and to leave the Bœotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answer, That the Citie of Sparta should give example to Thebes by setting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Bœotia did by as good right appertain to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agesilaus bearing a vehement hatred unto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawn back out of Asia into Greece, and disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to atchieve by the Persian war, did now passionately urge that point of setting the Bœotians at libertie; and finding it as obstinately refused, he dasht the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the same time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta, lay in Phocis, who received command from the Governours of Sparta forthwith to enter upon the Land of the Thebans with all his power; which he did, and was there slain at Leuctra, and with him the flower of his Armie. This battell of Leuctra, being one of the most famous that ever were fought between the Greeks, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it self, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battell (between which and the conclusion of the generall peace there passed but twenty daies) the Lacedæmonians were never able to recover the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted far and neer; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose greatest ambition had in former times confined it selfunto the little Region of Bœotia, did now begin to undertake the leading and command of many people and estates, in such wise, that soon after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong unto the Gates of Sparta. So much doe the afflictions of an hard war, valiantly endured, advance the affairs of the distressed, and guide them into the way of conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and ease had through luxurie, retchlesnesse, and many other vices or vanities, made rustic and effeminate.

§. II.

How the Athenians took upon them to maintain the peace of Greece. New troubles beset arising. Epaminondas invadeth and wasteth the Territorie of Lacedæmon.

THe Athenians refusing to take advantage of this overthrow fallen upon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedæmonians; did nevertheless finely give them to understand, that their Dominion was expired, and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking upon themselves the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agesilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarrels that might arise) had left unperfect, they assembled the Deputies of all the Estates confederated at Athens; where the generall libertie of all Towns, as well small as great, was ratified under the stile of the Athenians, and their associats. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantinæans, claiming power by this decree to order their affairs at their own pleasure, did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their Town, re-edifie it, and allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondency with the Lacedæmonians; some to weaken & keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedæmonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantinæans, nor take upon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till such time as the factions brake out into violence, & each partie called in forrain help. Then was an Armie sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantinæans, but indeed against them both. Agesilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the the Phocians, and were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubœans, and many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Peloponnesus in favour of the Arcadians, who had, upon expectation of their comming, abstained from giving battell to Agesilaus. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians, the Region of Laconia was invaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found belief if any had foretold it. Almost 600. years were spent, since the Dorians, under the posteritie of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time the sound of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie. Ten years were not fully past, since all Greece was at the devotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xerxes with his huge Armie could once look upon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other enemy-States had dared to set foot on, saving by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoak whereof the women of Sparta were ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedæmonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but sought how to preserve the Town, setting at liberty as many of their Heilotes or Slaves as were willing to bear Arms in defence of the State, and somewhat pitifully entreated the Athenians to give them succour. From Corinth and some towns of Peloponnesus they received speedie assistance; the Athenians came forward more slowly, so that Epaminondas returned without battell, having re-builded the Citie of Messene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedæmonians many ages before had chased away to other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

§. III.

The Composition between Athens and Sparta for command in War against the Thebans; who again invade and spoil Peloponnesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

THis journey therefore utterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, in such wise, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Armie, which was to be raised, nor any manner of precedence: but sending Embassadours from Sparta, and from all the Cities which held league with it, unto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generals by Land. This had been a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be employed at Sea, were men of no mark or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot, whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have served under the Lacedæmonians. Wherefore it was agreed that the Authoritie should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacedæmonians other five, and so successively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vain ambition was more regarded than the common profit; which must of necessitie be very slowly advanced, where consultation, resolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second invasion of Peloponnesus, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so unable to impeach them, that having fortified Isthmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against Xerxes, they were driven out of their strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Countrie without resistance. But as the Articles of this league between Athens and Sparta did, by dividing the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians considering their own numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like manner share the government, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by increasing whose greatnesse they should strengthen their own yoke. Hereupon they began to demean themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For, a motion of generall peace having been made (which took not effect, because the Citie of Messene was not abandoned to the Lacedæmonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was upon these Arcadians, who relying too much upon their own worth, were overthrown in a great battell, their calamitie being as pleasing to their Confederates, as to their Enemies.

§. IV.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greeks to the Persian; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse issue of the Embassages.

THe Thebans especially rejoyced at the Arcadians misfortune, considering, that without their aid, the successe of all enterprises proved so ill; whereas they themselves had by their own power accomplished very well whatsoever they took in hand, and were become not onely victorious over the Lacedæmonians, but patrons over the Thessalonians, and moderators of great quarrels that had risen in Macedonia; where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them best, they carried Philip the son of Amyntas, and father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage unto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of all Greece, they sought means of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Captain Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxerxes to grant unto the Thebans all that they desired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messene should remain free from the Lacedæmonians, and that the Athenians should forbear to send their ships of warre to Sea; only the latter of these two was somwhat qualified with reference to further advice. The other States of Greece did also send their Embassadours at the same time, of whom few or none received much contentment. For the king having found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintain a sure partie in Greece, did upon many weighty considerations resolve to bind the Thebans firmly unto him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should be on that side his own securitie. The Athenians had been ancient enemies to his Crown; and having turned the profit of their victories upon the Persians to the purchase of a great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signorie in such puissant manner, that (sundrie grievous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre, wherein the Lacedæmonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aid by Darius Nothus, were not able to vanquish them till their own indiscretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedæmonians being victorious over Athens, had no sooner established their Dominion at home, than they undertook the conquest of Asia, from which though by the commotion raised in Greece with Persian gold, they were called back, yet having renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not unlikely, that they should upon the next advantage have pursued the same enterprise, had not they been empeached by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwayes discovered a good affection to the Crown of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his invasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedæmonians against Athens: And finally, having offered much contumelie to Agesilaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of Sparta. Besides all these their good deservings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore unlikely to look abroad; whereupon if perchance they should have any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good haven towns, which they could not seize upon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxerxes did wholly condescend unto the requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might, without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that mean he purchased his own quiet, being never afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Asia. The ill meane which the Greeks had to disturb Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritimate Provinces. For had then the affairs of Greece been so composed, that any one Citie might without empeachment of the rest have transported an Army to assist the revolting Satrapæ, or Vice-roys of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mysia, Lycia, Pisidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phœnicia; humane reason can hardly find the means, by which the Empire could have been preserved from that ruine, which the divine Counsell had deferred unto the dayes of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting a firm body of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discussed, and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatiques wearied quickly with the travels and dangers incident to War, forsaking the common cause, and each man striving to be the first, that by treason to his company should both redeem the former treason to his Prince, and purchase with all his own promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; but for that it was like a sudden storm, rashly commenced, idlely followed, and foolishly layd down, having made a great noyse without effect, and having small reference to any other action agreeable; as also because in the whole reign of Artaxerxes, from the War of Cyrus to the invasion of Egypt, I find nothing (this insurrection, and a fruitlesse journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any mention, much lesse of digression from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time passed away so quietly, that he enjoyed the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could afford unto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only, or chiefly Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Parysatis the Queen-Mother bare unto his wife Statira, and to such as had been the greatest enemies to her sonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death: upon whom, when by poyson and mischievous practices she had satisfied her feminine appetite of revenge, thenceforth she wholly applyed her self to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd desire of marrying his own Daughter, and filling him with the perswasion, which Princes not endued with an especiall grace, do readily entertain; That his own will was the supreme law of his subjects, and the rule by which all things were to be measured and adjudged to be good or evill. In this imaginary happinesse Pelopidas, and the other Embassadors of Greece, both found and left him; but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the conclusion of this Treaty with them, being altogether to his own advantage, did seem to promise, if not the perpetuity, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least) a full security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be feared. But such foundations of eternity layd by mortall men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vain and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raised to full height, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, & other Estates of Greece that had sent Embassadours to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Towns, as well the little as the great, should be set at liberty, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the judges of all controversies that might arise, and Leaders in War of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being solemnly published at Thebes, in the presence of Embassadours drawn thither from all parts of Greece, when an oath was required for observation of the form of peace therein set down, a dilatory answer was made by the Embassadours, who said, that they were sent to hear the articles, not to swear unto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to send unto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vain. For when the Corinthians had boldly refused it, saying, that they did not need it; others took courage by their example to do the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gave neither addition nor confirmation of greatnesse, but left them as it found them to relye upon their own swords.

§. V.

How all Greece was divided between the Athenians and Lacedæmonians on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumult rising in Arcadia.

THe condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus: Athens and Sparta, which in former times had commanded all that Nation, and each upon envie of the others greatnesse drawn all their followers into a cruell intestine Warre, by which the whole Countrie, and especially the Estates of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoyn their forces against the Thebans, who sought to make themselves Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the party of these ancient governing Cities, either for the old reputation of them, & benefits received, or in dislike dislike of those, who by strong hand were ready to become Rulers, to which authority they could not suddenly aspire without some injurie and much envie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessitie had made warlike, and many victories in few years had filled with great spirits, and being so mighty independants, that she had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peloponnesus (the Region of Attica, and very little part beside excepted) under such acknowledgement, as wanted not much of meer Vassallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein already she had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argives had been alwayes bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought themselves in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre under them in valour, having been often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of losing all: which caused them to suspect and envie nothing more than the greatnesse and honour of Sparta, taking truce with her when she was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them; but firmly joyning with her enemies whensoever they found her entangled in a difficult warre. As the Argives were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, transported with a great opinion of their own worthinesse, had formerly renounced and provoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedæmonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to send an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And surely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens, which was very strange, and seemed no lesse to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firm league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did nevertheless accept this new Confederacie, not relinquishing the old, because they found that howsoever these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedæmonians, they should hereby be drawn somwhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was unlikely to invade Peloponnesus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any means stay the comming of Epaminondas; who finding the way somewhat more clear for him (because the Citie of Corinth, which lay upon the Isthmus, and had been adverse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this grievous warre, driven to become Neutrall) took occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principall men among them had laid hands on, under pretence of employing it to publike uses. In compounding the differences grown upon this occasion, such as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their hands, procured the Captain of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Country-men, as people desirous of innovation. This was done: but the up-roare thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Arcadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a-doe scarce pacified. When complaint of the Captains proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame upon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know, that he would be shortly among them, to judge of their fidelity, by the assistance which they should give him, in that war which he intended to make in Peloponnesus. These Lordly words did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aid of so mighty a power as he drew along with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to be made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before sought means to settle the affairs of their Countrie, by drawing things to some good conclusion of peace, did now forthwith send to Athens for help, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadours to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now ready to be invaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedæmonians, who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best provisions, would be no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had been accustomed unto such a supremacie, as they would in no wise communicate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their own estate could not be thought upon) did now very gently yeeld to the Arcadians, that the command of the Armie in chief, should be given for the time, to that Citie in whose Territorie it lay.

§. VI.

A terrible invasion of Peloponnesus by Epaminondas.

CErtain it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a very firm consent, and uniform care of the common safetie. For, beside the great forces raised out of the other parts of Greece, the Argives & Messenians prepared with all their strength to joyn with Epaminondas; who having lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, received there intelligence, that the Army comming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attempt of the Thebans, would be upon such of the Arcadians as had revolted, which caused the Lacedamonian Captains to fortifie Mantinea with all diligence, and to send for Agesilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men which remained in the Town, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held so good espiall upon his enemies, that had not an unknow fellow brought hasty advertisement of his purpose to Agesilaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinea, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly bin taken. For thither with all speed and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had surely carried the Citie, notwithstanding any defence that could have bin made by that handfull of men remaining within it, but that Agesilaus in all flying haste got into it with his companies, whom the Armie of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrival of the Lacedamonians and their friends, as it cut off all hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, so it presented him with a fair advantage upon Mantinea. It was the time of Harvest, which made it very likely, that the Mantineans, finding the war to be carried from their wals into another quarter, would use the commodity of that vacation, by fetching in their corn, and turning out their cattell into the fields, whilest no enemy was neer that might impeach them. Wherefore he turned away from Sparta to Mantinea, sending his horse-men before him, to seize upon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the country, far more intent upon their harvest businesse, than upon the war, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselves out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being unable to recover the Town, were in a desperate case, and the town it self in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemie should have taken all their provision of victuals, with so many of the people as had not over-deerly bin redeemed, by that Cities returning to societie with Thebes. But at the same time, the Athenians comming to the succour of their Confederates, whom they thought to have found at Mantinea, were very earnestly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any courageous adventure to deliver those who otherwise were given as lost. The Thebans were known at that time to be the best Souldiers of all the Greeks, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies bin given to the Thessalians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations; yet the regard of honour so wrought upon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this war upon no necessitie of her own, but only in desire of relieving her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantinea, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meat; and giving a lustie charge upon the enemy, who as bravely received them, after a long and hot fight, they remained masters of the field, giving by this victory a safe and easie retrait to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Bœotians arrived in the place soon after this battell, whom the Lacedamonians and their assistants were not far behind.

Epaminondas, considering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprizing Sparta and Mantinea having failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnesians, would soon vanish, unless by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first growth, & leave some memorable character of his expedition, resolved to give them battell, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his own Associats, and to leave the Spartans as weak in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for that battell, wherin victorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be such as promised the accomplishment of his own desire; he made shew of declining the enemie, and intrenching himself in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, he might allay the heat of their valour, and afterward strike their senses with amazement, when he should come upon them unexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in so great & sudden a danger, the enemie ran to Arms, necessitie enforcing their resolution, & the consequence of that daies service urging them to do as well as they might. The Theban Army consisted of thirty thousand foot, & three thousand horse; the Lacedæmonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the war was in their Countrie) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedæmonians; the Athenians had the left wing; the Achæans, Eleans, and others of lesse account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their own battell, opposite to the Lacedæmonians, having by them the Arcadians, the Eubœans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Messenians, and Thessalians with others, compounding the main battell; the Argives held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flanks, only a troup of the Eleans were in rear. Before the footmen could joyn, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherin finally the Thebans prevailed, notwithstanding the valiant resistance of the Athenians: who not yeelding to the enemie either in courage or skill, were overlayd with numbers, and so beaten upon by Thessalian slings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselves together, and did not fall back upon their own foot-men; but finding the Theban horse to have given them over, and withall discovering some Companies of foot, which had bin sent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battell in the rear, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in pieces. In the mean season the battell of the Athenians had not only to doe with the Argives, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horsemen, in such wise that it began to open, & was ready to turn back, when the Elean squadron of Horse came up to the relief of it, and restored all on that part. With far greater violence did the Lacedæmonians and Thebans meet, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour; so that equall courage and equall losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: unlesse perhaps the Lacedæmonians being very firm abiders, might seem the more likely to prevaile, as having borne the first brunt and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted; and being framed by discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few years, cannot be thought to have gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiving the obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to be such, as neither the bad successe of their own horse, nor all the force of the Bœotian Armie, could abate so far, as to make them give one foot of ground; taking a choice companie of the most able men, whom he cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the advantage of that figure against a squadron, and by his own exceeding vertue, accompanied with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their rancks, and cleave the whole battell in despight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day won by the Thebans, who may justly be said to have carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the

the ground whereon the battell was fought, having driven the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alleged by the Athenians, as a token that the victory was partlyheirs, the slaughter of those Mercenaries upon whom they lighted by chance in their own flight, finding them behind their Army, & the retaining of their dead bodies, it was a ceremony regardable only among the Greeks, and served meerly for ostentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the enemy could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battell, none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who forsake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for skill of their abilitie and prowesse. This was the last work of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troup of men, which broke the Lacedemonian squadron, and forced it to give back in disaray, was furiously charged on the sudden, by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone, whereby receiving many wounds, he nevertheless with a singular courage maintained the fight, using against the enemies many of their Darts, which he drew out of his own body; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, he received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaving the yron and a peece of the crancheon in his breast. Hereupon he sunk down, and was soon conveyed out of the fight by his friends, having by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who fain would have got his bodie,) but much more inflamed with revengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heavy misehance, did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the sadnesse of this disaster, than with all the travell of the day. Epaminondas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Physicians, that when the head of the Dart should be drawn out of his body, he must needs dye. Hearing this he called for his shield, which to have lost, was held a great dishonour. It was brought unto him. He bad them tell him which part had the victory, answer was made, that the Boeotians had won the field. Then said he, It is a fair time for me to dye; and withall sent for Iolidas and Diophantes, two principall men of War, that were both slain, which being told him, He advised the Thebans to make peace, whilest with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a General. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawn out of his body, comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of issue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuctra and Mantinea were two fair daughters, in whom his memory should live.

So died Epaminondas, the worthiest man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to be matched in any Age or Countrie: for he equalled all others in the severall vertues, which in each of them were singular. His Justice and Sincerities, his Temperance, Wisdome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferior to his Military vertue: in every part whereof he so excelled, that he could not properly be called a Warrier a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Provident Captain. Neither was his private Conversation unanswerable to those high parts, which gave him praise abroad. For he was Grave, and yet very Affable and Courteous; resolute in publique businesse, but in his own particular easie, and of much mildnesse: a lover of his People, bearing with mens infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, far from insolence, Master of his own affections, and furnished with all qualities that might win and keep love. To these graces were added great ability of body, much Eloquence, and very deep knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his mind being enlightened, rested not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gave unto Thebes, which had ever more bin an underling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoyning, and the highest command in Greece.

§. VIII.

§. VIII.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battell of Mantinea. The voyage of Agesilaus into Egypt. His death, and qualities; with an examination of the comparison made between him and Pompey the Roman.

THis battell of Mantinea was the greatest that had ever been fought in the Countrie between the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Platea, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gave rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Grecian valour; neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie so perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian War, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were undertaken against forrain enemies, proving for the most part unfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interessed, which never had more able Souldiers, and brave Commanders, nor ever contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obstinate resolution. All which notwithstanding the issue being such as hath bin related, it was found best for every particular Estate, that a generall peace should be established, every one retaining what he presently had, and none being forced to depend upon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league, which caused the Lacedæmonians not to enter into it. Their standing out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclusion, considering that Sparta was now too weak to offend her Neighbours, and therefore might well be allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it self in execution. This peace, as it gave some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it afforded leasure to seek after wealth by forrain employment in Egypt, whither Agesilaus was sent with some small forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenarie to serve under Tachos King of Egypt in his War upon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Egypt, went now as a volunterie, with such forces as he could raise, by entreatie, and offer of good pay, to the same service. These Egyptian Kings descended from Amyrtæus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nothus, having retained the Country, notwithstanding all intestine dissentions, and forrain invasions, during three Generations of their own race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greeks, that by their help (easily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not onely to assure themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adjoyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might have been, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is uncertain. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it self had soon come to nothing, if Agesilaus had not proved a false Traitor, joyning with Nectanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebell with that Army which the mony of Tachos had waged. This falsehood Agesilaus excused, as tending to the good of his own Country, though it seem rather, that he grudged because the King took upon himself the conduct of the Armie, using his service only as Lieutenant, who had made full account of being appointed the Generall. However it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betrayed by them, in whom he had reposed his chief confidence, fled unto the Persian, who upon his submission gave him gentle entertainment; and Nectanebus (who seems to have been the Nephew of Tachos) reigned in his stead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set up another King; to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yeelded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so far, that he left Nectanebus in quiet possession of the Kingdome; who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good service done to himself, rewarded him with two hundred and thirtie Talents of silver, with which bootie sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in War, free from covetousnesse, and not reproached with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesse admirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was such as did endue every one of the Citizens (not carried away by the violent stream of an ill nature) with all, or the chief of these good qualities. He was nevertheless very arrogant, perverse, unjust and vain-glorious, measuring all things by his own will, and obstinately prosecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of Xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be overthrown; with which conceit being transported, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans and their Allies, he did ever after bear such hatred unto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meer necessitie to grow warlike, and able, to the utter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable loss of all her former greatness. The commendations given to him by Xenophon his good friend, have caused Plutarch to lay his name as the ballance against Pompey the Great; whose actions (the solemn gravitie of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truely say, That as Pompey made great warres under sundry Climates and in all the Provinces of the Roman Empire, exceeding in the multitude of imployments all that were before him; so Agesilaus had at one time or other some quarrell with every Town in Greece, had made a Warre in Asia, and meddled in the businesse of the Egyptians, in which varietie he went beyond all his Predecessours: yet not winning any Countries, as Pompey did many, but obtaining large wages, which Pompey never took. Herein also they were very like. Each of them was the last great Captain which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrie by his own Lordly wilfulnesse. We may therefore well say, Similia magis omnia quam paria, The resemblance was neerer than the equalitie. Indeed the freedome of Rome was lost with Pompey, falling into the hands of Cæsar, whom he had inforced to take Armes; yet the Roman Empire stood, the form of Government onely being changed: But the libertie of Greece, or of Sparta it self, was not forfeited unto the Thebans, whom Agesilaus had compelled to enter into a victorious Warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renown of Sparta was presently lost; and the freedome of all Greece being wounded in this Theban warre, and after much bloud lost, ill healed by the peace ensuing, did very soon, upon the death of Agesilaus, give up the ghost, and the Lordship of the whole Countrie was seized by Philip King of Macedon, whose actions are now on foot, and more to be regarded than the Contemporarie passages of things, in any other Nation.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD;

Intreating of the times from the reign of Philip of Macedon, to the establishing of that Kingdome, in the race of ANTIGONUS.

THE FOURTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of Philip the father of Alexander the Great, King of Macedon.

§. I.

What Kings reigned in Macedon before Philip.

THe Greeks, of whom we have alreadie made large discourse, not as yet wearied with intestine War, nor made wise by their vain contention for superioritie, doe still, as in former times, continue the invasion and vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the world, they defended their libertie, with as happy successe as ever Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath ever been acquired by deeds of Arms. And having had a triall and experience, more than fortunate, against those nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had so often forfeited the reputation of their forces, as whatsoever could be spared from their own distraction at home, they transported over the Hellespont, as sufficient, to entertain and busie them withall.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of mark in the world, that they underfall, and perish by the hands and harmes which they least fear; so fared it at this time with the Greeks. For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speak) they had so little regard, as they grew even then more violent in devouring each other, when the fast-growing greatnesse of such a Neighbour-King, should, in regard of their own safeties, have served them for a strong argument of union and accord. But the glorie of their Persian victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but themselves, and the rather to value at little the power and purposes of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which sate nearer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the father of Philip, so much weakned them, and won upon them, that they were not (as the Grecians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover recover their own, much lesse to work any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophie to consider, That all great alterations are stormie, sudden, and violent; and that it is then over-late to repair the decayed and broken banks, when great rivers are once swollen, fast-running, and inraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking down those defences which stood between them and this inundation, than seek to rampire and re-enforce their own fields, which by the Levell of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was therefore well concluded by Orosius: Græcia Civitates imperare singulæ cupiunt, imperium omnes perdiderunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by striving each of them to command all. Oros. l. 3. c. 12.

The Kingdom of Macedon, so called of Macedon, the son of Osiris, or, as other Authors affirm, of Jupiter and Æthra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Ægean Sea; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and South-west by Thessalie and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the familie of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argives; who are listed as followeth. About some six years after the translation of the Assyrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media, Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as he was marching through that Countrie, the weather being rayme and tempestuous, he espied a great herd of Goats, which fled the storm as fast as they could, hasting them to their known place of covert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to mind, that he had also by another Oracle bin directed, to follow the first troup of beasts, that should either lead him, or flie before him; He pursued these Goats to the Gates of Edessa, and being undiscovered by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darknesse of the air, he entred their Citie without resistance, and possest it. Soon after this, by the overthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twenty years. Cœnus succeeded Caranus, and reigned twelve years. Tyrimas followed Cœnus, and ruled eight and twenty years. Paul. Dion. Conf. Theop. Antio. 6. Euseb. in Chro.

Perdiccas the first, the son of Tyrimas, governed one and fifty years: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Justine, Eusebius, Theophilus Antiochenus, and others, affirm, that he appointed a place of buriall for himself, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successors, at Ægæ: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his Line and Race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is said, that because Alexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenida failed in him: a thing rather devised after the effect, as I conceive, than foretold by Perdiccas. Sol. c. 14. Plin. l. 4. c. 10.

Argæus succeeded unto Perdiccas, and ruled eight and twenty years. Euseb. in Chro.

Philip the first, his successor, reigned eight and twentie years.

Europus followed Philip, and governed six and twenty years: in whose infancie the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victory, they pursued the same, to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and resolving either to recover their former losse; or to lose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carryed him with them in his cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not be beaten (their King being present) or rather they perswaded themselves that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their naturall Lord, being an infant, and no way (but by the hands of his servants) able to defend himself from destruction. The like is reported by Aimonius of Clotarius, the son of Fredegunda. Euseb. Justin. Ammian. The. Ant. &c. Aimon. l. 3. c. 82.

Alcetas succeeded Æropus, and ruled nine and twentie years.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alcetas, and reigned fifty years: He lived at such time as Darius Hystaspes, after his unprosperous return out of Scythia, sent Megabazus with an Armie into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Amyntas to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding unto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadours, as you have heard before, were, for their insolent behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, slain by the direction of Alexander, who was the son of Amyntas, and his Successor. Her. Eus. Just. &c.

Alexander surnamed the Rich, the son of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and fortie years. He did not only appease the wrath of Megabazus, for the slaughter of the Persian Embassadours, by giving Gygæa his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Persia, but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that Region between the Mountains of Olympus and Hemus, to be united to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greeks. For Xerxes being returned into Asia, and Mardonius made Generall of the Persian Armie; Alexander acquainted the Greeks with all his intents and purposes against them. He had three sons, Perdiccas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Her. lib. 8. Plut. Euseb. Just. &c.

Perdiccas the second, the son of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and reigned in all eight and twenty years. The wars which he made were not much remarkable: the Storie of them is found here and there by pieces in Thucydides his first six Books. He left behind him two sons; Perdiccas, who was very young; and Archelaus, who was base borne.

Perdiccas the third, being delivered to the custodie and care of Archelaus, was at seven years of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excusing this fact to Cleopatra the mother of the young King, said, That the child in following a Goose hastily, fell thereinto by misadventure. But Archelaus stayed not here: for having thus dispatched his brother, he slew both his Uncle Alcetas the son of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the son of this Alcetas, his Cousin Germain, and enjoyed the Kingdom of Macedon himself four and twentie years.

Plut in Gorg. Aristi. in Pol. 5.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plato and Aristotle make mention, though he made himself King by wicked murder, yet he performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is said, That he sought by all means to draw Socrates unto him, and that he greatly loved and honoured Eurypides the Tragedian. He had two sons, Archelaus and Orestes.

Archelaus the second succeeded his father, and having reigned seven years, he was slain in hunting, either by chance, or of purpose, by Crataus.

Orestes his younger son was committed to the education of Æropus, of the royall bloud of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupil; for Æropus murthered him and usurped the Kingdome, which he held some six years: the same who denied passage to Agesilaus King of Sparta, who desired after his return from the Asian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into Greece.

Diod Polyan. Plut. in Demet.

This Usurper left three sons, Pausanias, Argæus, and Alexander. Pausanias succeeded his father Æropus, and having reigned one year, he was driven out by Amyntas the son of Philip, the son of the first Perdiccas, the son of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserved, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdiccas, his uncle Alcetas, and his son Alexander. This Amyntas reigned (though very unquietly) four and twentie years; for he was not only infested by Pausanias, assisted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argæus, incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the said Argæus, for two years dispossest of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours neer the Ægean Sea, made themselves for a while Masters of Pella, the chief Citie of Macedon.

Amyntas the second had by his wife Eurydice the Illyrian, three sons; Alexander the second, Perdiccas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great: and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione. He had also by his second Wife Gygæa, three Sons; Archelaus, Argæus, and Menelaus, afterward slain by their brother Philip. He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie surnamed Alorites, of the Citie of Alorus, wherein he was born.

Alexander the second reigned not much above one year, in which time he was invaded by Pausanias, the son of Æropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. He was also constrained (for the payment of a great sum of mony) to leave his youngest brother Philip in Hostage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander being invited by the Alevada against Alexander the tyrant of Pheres in Thessalie, having redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his assistance, entred into Confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrie, with whom he also left Philip with divers other principall persons, for the gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his mother falling in love with her Son-in-law, who had married her Daughter

Daughter Euryone or Exione, practiſed the death of Alexander her ſon, with a purpoſe to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolemy Aloritas did put in execution: by means whereof he held Macedon for three years, but was ſoon after ſlain by Perdiccas the brother of Alexander. Diodore hath it otherwiſe of Philip being made pledge, and faith, That Amyntas his father delivered him for hoſtage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conveyed to Thebes, there to be kept: others report that Philip (while his father was yet living) was firſt ingaged to the Thebans, and delivered for hoſtage a ſecond time by Alexander his brother. Diod. l. 15. & 16.

Perdiccas the third, after he had ſlain Aloritas his baſe brother, governed Macedon five years, and was then ſlain in a battell againſt the Illyrians, according to Diodorus, but Juſtine affirmeth that he periſhed by the practice of Eurydice his mother, as Alexander did. Juſt. l. 7.

§. II.

The beginning of Philip's reign: and how he delivered Macedon from the troubles wherein hee found it intangled.

Philip the ſecond, the youngeſt ſon of Amyntas by Eurydice, having bin inſtructed in all knowledge requiſite unto the government of a Kingdom, in that excellent education which he had under Epaminondas, making an eſcape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the firſt year of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourſcore and thirteen years: and finding the many enemies and dangers wherewith the Kingdom was invironed, he took on him, not as a King (for Perdiccas left a ſon, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of war. Yet his fruitfull ambition ſoon over-grew his modeſtie, and he was eaſily perſwaded by the people to accept both the title of King, and withall, the abſolute rule of the Kingdome. And to ſay the truth, the neceſſitie of the State of Macedon at that time required a King both prudent and active. For, beſides the incurſions of the Illyrians and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did ſet up in oppoſition Pauſanias; the Athenians, Argæus, ſons of the late Uſurper Æropus: each of theſe labouring to place in Macedon a King of their own election. Theſe heavie burdens when Philip could not well bear, he bought off the weightieſt by mony, and by fair promiſes unloaded himſelf of ſo many of the reſt, as he ran under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithſtanding that his brother Perdiccas had his death accompanied with four thouſand Macedonians, beſide thoſe that were wounded and taken priſoners; and that the Pannonians were deſtroying all before them in Macedon; and that the Athenians with a Fleet by Sea, and three thouſand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat upon him on all ſides & quarters of his Countrie: yet after he had practiſed the men of war of Pannonia, and corrupted them with gifts; and had alſo bought the King of Thrace from Pauſanias, he forthwith made head againſt the Athenians his ſtiffeſt enemies; and, for the firſt, he prevented their recovery of Amphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon: and did then purſue Argæus the ſon of Æropus, ſet againſt him by the Athenians, and followed him ſo hard at the heels, in his retrait from Æges, that he forced him to abide the battell: which Argæus loſt, having the greateſt part of his Armie ſlain in the place. Thoſe of the Athenians, and others which remained unbroken, took the advantage of a ſtrong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoyding thereby the preſent furie of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquiſhers life and libertie to return into Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded between him and the Athenians for that preſent, and for this clemencie he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greeks.

§. III.

The good ſucceſſe which Philip had in many enterpriſes.

NOw had Philip leaſure to look Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Pannians, his irreconcileable enemies and borderers: both which hee invaded with so prosperous successe as he slew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Macedon: and withall upon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierc'd that Country, and after a main victory obtained, he enforc'd them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done than (without staying to take longer breath) he hasted speedily towards Larissa, upon the river Peneus in Thessaly, of which Town he soon made himself master; and thereby he got good footing in that Country, whereof he made use in time following. Now although he resolved either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his own against all others, because the horse-men of that Country were the best, and most feared in that part of Europe; yet he thought it most for his safety to close up the entrances out of Thrace, lest while he invaded Thessaly and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdraw him, or over-run Macedon, as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous river of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon, and won it. He also recovered Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the City of Crenides (sometime Datus) and called it after his name Philippi: to the people whereof Saint Paul afterward directed one of his Epistles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips affairs, he drew yearly a thousand talents, which make six hundred thousand French Crowns.

And that he might with the more ease disburden the Thracian shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis, he entred into league with his fathers malicious enemies, the Olynthians; whom the better to fasten unto him, he gave them the City of Pynda with the territory, meaning nothing lesse than that they should enjoy it, or their own Estate, many years.

Now that he might by degrees win ground upon the Greekes, hee took the fair occasion to deliver the City of Pheres in Thessaly, from the tyrants Lycophron and Tisiphonus: who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who usurped upon the liberty of that State, they themselves (Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the assistance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres restored to her former liberty. Which act of Philip did for ever after fasten the Thessalians unto him, and, to his exceeding great advantage, binde them to his service.

§. IV.

Of the Phocian War which first drew Philip into Greece.

ABout this time, to wit, in the second year of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight years after the battell of Mantinæa, and about the eighth year of Artaxerxes Ochus, began that War, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternall providence, and of every great alteration in the World, there is some preceding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this revengefull hatred by the Thebans, Thessalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with half a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greeks themselves, beating down their own defences, to give him an easie passage; and beating themselves, to give him victory without perill, left nothing unperformed towards their own slavery, saving the title and imposition. Of this War the Thebans (made over-proud by their victory at Leuctres) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the Amphyctiones, or of the generall Estates of Greece, in which at that time they swayed most, they caused both the Lacedæmonians and Phocians to be condemned in greater summes of money than they could well bear; the one for surprizing the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing up a piece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resolved not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on, and encouraged by the Lacedæmonians: and for refusall were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accursed to all their neighbour-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and destroy them at their pleasures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captain of their own, cast the same dice of hazzard that Cæsar after many Ages following did; but had not the same chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their own Nation. And the better to bear out an ungracious quarrell, of which there was left no hope of compoſition, they reſolved to ſack the Temple it ſelf. For ſeeing that for the ploughing of a piece of Apollo's ground, they had ſo much offended their Neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worſe could not befall them than already was intended; they reſolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to periſh for all, or to prevail againſt all that had commiſſion to call them to account. The treaſure which they took out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was ten thouſand talents, which in thoſe dayes ſerved them to wage a great many men; and ſuch was their ſucceſſe in the beginning of the war, as they won three great battels againſt the Thebans, Theſſalians and Locrians; but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus caſt himſelf headlong over the Rocks.

In the mean while the Cities of Cherſoneſus, both to defend themſelves againſt their bad neighbour Philip, who encroached upon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themſelves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the ſiege of Methone loſt one of his eyes. It is ſaid, That he that ſhot him, did purpoſely direct his arrow toward him, and that it was written on the ſhaft thereof: After Philippo; After to Philip: for ſo he was called that gave him the wound. This Citie he evened with the ſoil. Plut. in Vlpian. Strab. l. 8.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was buſied on the border of Thrace, and the Theſſalians ingaged in the holy war, entred Theſſaly with new forces, being aſſiſted by Onomarchus, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomelus. For hereby the Phocians hoped ſo to entertain the Theſſalians at home, as they ſhould not find leaſure to invade them. Hereupon was Philip the ſecond time called into Theſſalie; but both the Theſſalians and Macedonians (Philip being preſent) were utterly overthrown by Onomarchus, and great numbers of both Nations loſt. From Theſſalie, Onomarchus drew ſpeedily towards Bœotia, and with the ſame victorious Armie brake the forces of the Bœotians, and took from them their Citie of Coronea. But Philip, impatient of his late miſadventure, after he had re-enforced his Armie, returned with all ſpeed into Theſſalie, there to find again the honour which he lately loſt: and was the ſecond time encountred by Onomarchus, who brought into the field twentie thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe. All this great preparation ſufficed not; for Onomarchus was by Philip ſurmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie overturned, ſix thouſand ſlain, and three thouſand taken: of which number himſelf being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Thoſe that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which ſailed alongſt the coaſt, commanded by Chares; but the greateſt number of thoſe that took the Sea, were therein devoured ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now again driven out of Theſſalie, and Pheres made free as before.

Of the Olynthian war. The ambitious practices of Philip.

FRom hence Philip reſolved to invade Phocis it ſelf, but the Athenians did not favour his entrance into thoſe parts; and therefore with the help of the Lacedæmonians, they retrench'd his paſſage at the Streits of Thermopylis. Whereupon he returned into Macedon, and after the taking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Towns, he quarrelled with the Olynthians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olynthians were very ſtrong, and had evermore both braved and beaten the Macedonians. It is ſaid, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his half brother (for Amyntas had three ſons by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other ſons by Gygæa: but Philips elder brother by the ſame Mother being dead, he determined to rid himſelf alſo of the reſt) the two younger held themſelves within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cauſe of the war, Juſtine affirmeth. But juſt quarrels are ballanced by juſt Princes, for to this King all things were lawfull that might ſerve his turn; all his affections, and paſſions, how divers ſoever in other men, were in his ambition ſwallowed up, and thereinto converted. Juſt. l. 8.

For

Amphyctiones which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, forfeited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian sacrilege.

§. VII.

How Philip with ill successe attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

Philip, after his triumphant return into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armie Parmenio, slaughtered many thousands of the Illyrians and Dardarians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their revenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians stayed his furie. Perinthus was a Citie of Thrace, seated upon Propontis, in the mid-way between Sestos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resolved to defend their libertie against Philip, where the Athenians incouraged and assisted them. Philip sate down before it with a puissant Army, made many fair breaches, gave many furious assaults, built many over-topping and commanding Towers about it. But he was repelled with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall assaults to weary them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and mony, and succoured from Byzantium, which stood upon the same sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction of Phocion, with whatsoever was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byzantium, by reason of their neighbourhood, and easie passage by water, gave them often and ready help, Philip removed the one half of his Armie, and besieged it, leaving fifteen thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could: But to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that undertake divers enterprises at one time) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse: whereupon he made an overture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly desired into which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions; yet Demosthenes with his eloquence prevailed in the refusal. In the mean while, Philip having digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred threescore and ten Merchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his son Alexander, led them into Scythia; but he was also unprosperous in that enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Mœsia, set on him in his return, wounded him, and took from him the greatest part of the spoils which he had gathered.

§. VIII.

How Philip overthrowing the Greeks in the battell of Chæronæa, was chosen Captain-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

AMong these Northern Nations (part of which he suppresst, and part quieted) he spent some eight years; and in the ninth year, after the end of the holy War, he was by his great advantage invited again by the Grecians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphissa having disobeyed the decree of the Amphyctiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Locrians gave countenance and aid to the Amphissonians, the rest were not of themselves able to constrain them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must think that Philip was not long in resolving upon this enterprise; he needed no drawing on, whom nothing could keep back; nor other dissuasion than a mastering power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armie forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirty thousand Foot, and two thousand Horse; and with as much expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, won Plataa, and brought into subjection all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to fear that a great part of this storm would fall on themselves, yet were they dissuaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered, and rather made choice (having drawn the Thebans to joyn with them) to leave the enjoying of their estates and their freedome to the chance of one battell, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them dear. It is true, that he could far more easily mind them of the vertue of their Ancestors, than make them such as they were. He might repeat unto them (with words moving passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but he could not transform the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Miltiades, an Aristides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that ever Nation did. A Phocion they had, but by the strength of a contrary faction he was at this time in disgrace, and not imployed: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confedrates incountred, although some thousand of the Athenians did abide the killing, and the like number well-near of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of the worthy men on that side to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choice Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of a growing fortune, as it gave to Philip so shining a victory, that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despight of all the Nations interjacent) into Persia, India, and Egypt, so it cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Grecian glory: Yea their liberty (saith Curtius) with their large Dominion won with so many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for ever lost.

Now this advised King (never passionate to his disadvantage) to the end he might obtain the Soveraignty over all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captain-Generall against the Persians, without any further hazzard or trouble, was content to let go those Athenians that were taken at this battell of Cheronea, as he also forbare to attempt any thing against their Citie: but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondas triumphed over the rest) he lodged a Garrison of Macedonians. And being soon after (according unto the long desire which he had nourished of this Soveraignty) by the generall States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Grecians, and contribution of men and mony granted him, he compounded an Army of great strength, and under the Commandement of Attalus and Parmenio, transported the same over the Hellespont into Asia, to begin the War. Of his enterprise against Persia, he sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received such another convertible riddle, as Crœsus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like sort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discern and withstand the flatteries of our own appetites, so did Philips ambitious desire to invade Persia, abuse his judgement, so far, that the death, wherewith himself was threatned, he understood to be delivered of his enemy, whom he intended presently to invade. Before his purposed departure into Asia, he prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra, with Alexander King of Epirus; to which feast and pastimes thereat appointed, he invited all his Friends and Allies, with the principall persons of the Grecian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich presents: but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For having refused to doe justice one Pausanias, a Gentleman of his Guard, whom Attalus (greatly favoured by Philip) had first made drunk, and then left to be carnally abused by divers base persons: this Pausanias grew into so great a detestation of the Kings partiality in so foul a fact, as when Philip was passing towards the Theater, he drew a sword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when he had lived six and forty years, and reigned five and twenty. Justine reports it, that Olympias incouraged Pausanias to murder the King her husband, which after his death she boldly avowed, by the honour she did unto Pausanias, in crowning his dead body, in consecrating his sword unto Apollo, by building for him a monument, and other like Graces.

What good foundations of Alexanders greatnesse were laid by Philip. Of his laudable qualities and issue.

NOw although he were then taken from the World, when he had mastered all opposition on that side of the Sea, and had seen the fruits of his hopes, and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection; yet hee was here-herein happy, that he lived to see his son Alexander at mans estate, and had himself bin an eie-witnesse of his resolution and singular valour in this last battell.

The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laid so soundly for him, with so plain a pattern of the buildings which himself meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious, than the beginnings unto Philip, though lesse famous. For, besides the recovery of Macedon it self in competition between him and the sonnes of Æropus, the one assisted by the Thracians, the other by the Athenians, and besides the regaining of many places possest by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northern Kings his Neighbours, the over-throw of Olinthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Cities taken, of great strength and ancient freedome, and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many ages had defended it self against the greatest Kings of the World, and won upon them; He left unto his son, and had bred up for him so many choice Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and judgement in the Warre, were no lesse worthy of Crowns, than himself was that ware a Crown: For it was said of Parmenio (whom Alexander, ungratefull to so great vertue, impiously murthered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King; but the King without Parmenio never did any thing worthy of renowne: as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obey the Son of such a Father, yet to did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to themselves.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature and his excellent education had enriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his Affections, he had this favour of Piety, that he rather laboured to satisfie those that were grieved, than to suppresse them. Whereof (among many other) we find a good example in his dealing with Artadeus and Nicanor, whom, when for their evill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to put to death, he answered them, That first it ought to be considered, whether the fault were in them that gave him ill language, or in himself; Secondly, that it was in every mans own power to be well spoken of; and this was shortly proved, for after Philip relieved their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Wherupon he told those that had perswaded him to use violence, that he was a better Physician for evill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his son are remembred by Cicero and Gellius, and by Dion and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems are gathered by Polyænus and Frontinus, his wise sayings by Plutarch. And albeit he held Macedon as in his own right, all the time of his reign, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof, for Amyntas the son of his brother Perdiccas (of whom he had the Protection during his infancy) had the right. This Amyntas he married to his daughter Cyna, who had by him a daughter called Eurydice, who was married to Philips base son Aridæus, her Uncle by the Mothers side: both which Olympias, Philips first Wife, and Mother to Alexander the Great, put to death, Aridæus by extreme torments, Eurydice she strangled.

Philip had by this Olympias, the daughter of Neoptolemus, King of the Molossians (of the race of Achilles) Alexander the Great, and Cleopatra. Cleopatra was married to her Uncle Alexander, King of Epirus, and was after her brother Alexanders death slain at Sardis, by the commandement of Antigonus.

By Audata, an Illyrian, his second Wife, he had Cyna, married as is shewed before.

By Nicæsipolis, the Sister of Jason, Tyrant of Pheres, he had Thessalonica, whom Cassander, after he had taken Pidna, married; but she was afterward by her father-in-law Antipater put to death.

By Cleopatra the Neece of Attalus, he had Caranus, whom others call Philip: him Olympias, the Mother of Alexander the Great, caused to be rosted to death in a copper Pan. Others lay this murder to Alexander himself. By the same Cleopatra he had likewise a daughter called Europa, whom Olympias also murdered at the Mothers breast. Athen. l. 13. c. 2. Just. l. 3.

By Phila and Meda he had no issue.

He had also two Concubines, Arsinoe, whom after he had gotten with child, he married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie King of Egypt, called the Son of Lagus, but esteemed the Son of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a pub-a publike Dancer, he had Aridæus, of whom we shall have much occasion to speak hereafter.

Chap. II.

Of Alexander the Great.

A breif rehearsall of Alexanders doings, before he invaded Asia.

Alexander, afterwards called the Great, succeeded unto Philip his Father, being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and inriched in all sorts of Learning and good Arts. He began his reign over the Macedonians four hundred and seventeen years after Rome was built, and after his own birth twenty years. The strange dreams of Philip his father, and that one of the gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, I omit as foolish tales, but that the Temple of Diana (a work the most magnificent of the world) was burnt upon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three severall victories, obtained by the Macedonians, it was very remarkable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous, & foreshewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Upon the change of the King, the Neighbour Nations, whom Philip had oppreſt, began to consult about the recoverie of their former libertie, and to adventure it by force of arms. Alexanders young years gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected severitie increased courage in those, who could better resolve to die, than to live slavishly. But Alexander gave no time to those swelling humours, which might speedily have endangered the health of his Estate. For after revenge taken upon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew upon his Tombe, and the celebration of his Funeralls, he first fastened unto him his own nation, by freeing them from all exactions and bodily slavery, other than their service in his Wars, and used such Kingly austeritie towards those that contemned his young years, and such clemencie to the rest that perswaded themselves of the cruelnie of his disposition, as all affections being passed at home, he made a present journie into Peloponesus, and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Counsell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great desire of his heart, elected Captain-Generall against the Persians, upon which war Philip had not only resolved, (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmenio and Attalus, a part of his Armie, to recover some places on Asia-side, for the safe descent of the rest. This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those fair marks of Riches, Honour, and large Dominion, he now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts & imaginations were either grievous or hateful. But a contrary wind anseth; for he receiveth advertisement, that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedæmonians, had united themselves against him, and, by assistance from the Persian, hoped for the recoverie of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himself being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia: the devise he used was more subtile than profitable; for hee caused it to bee bruited that Alexander was slain in a battail against the Triballes, and brought into the assembly a companion whom hee had corrupted, to affirm, that himself was present, and wounded in the battail. There is indeed a certain Doctrine of Policie (as Policie is now a-daies defined by falshood and knaverie) that devised rumors & lies, if they serve the turn but for a day or two, are greatly available. It is true that common people are sometimes mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarums in the Wars; but in all that I have observed, I have found the success as ridiculous as the invention. For as those that find themselves at one time abused by such like bruits, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are upon true reports, and in in occasions perillous, summoned to assemble, so doe all men in generall condemn the Venters of such trompery, and for them, fear upon necessary occasions to entertain the truth it self. This labour unlooked for, and losse of time, was not onely very grievous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Gracians, of whose assistance he thought himself assured, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot endure to strive against the wind, shall hardly attain the Port which he purposeth to recover: and it no lesse becommeth the worthiest men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewail them.

He therefore made such expedition towards these Revolters, as that himself, with the Army that followed him, brought them the first newes of his preparation. Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacifie the King, and to be received again into his grace. Alexander was not long in resolving, for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Gracians. Wise men are not easily drawn from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King ever brought to effect any great affair, who hath intangled himself in many enterprises at once, not tending to one and the same certain end.

And having now quieted his borderers towards the South, he resolved to assure those Nations which lay on the North side of Macedon, to wit, the Thracians, Tribalies, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other salvage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not onely other of his Predecessors, but even Philip his Father: with all which, after divers overthrowes given them, he made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, hee could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than liberty, the Greeks had enjoyed it over-long, and had it too late to forget it, they therefore shake off the yoke once again. The Thebans, who had in their Citadell a Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hasteneth to their succour, and presents himself with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horse, before the City, and gave the Inhabitants some daies to resolve, being even heart-sick with the desire of passing into Asia. So unwilling, indeed, he was to draw bloud of the Gracians, by whom he hoped to serve himself elsewhere, that he offered the Thebans remission, if they would only deliver into his hands Phœnix and Prothytes, the stirrers up of the Rebellion. But they, opposing the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all resistance before it, like the breaking in of the Ocean Sea) in stead of such an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, demanded Philotas and Antipater to be delivered unto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Provinces, could either have evened the scale or swayed it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacy. For while the Thebans oppose the Army assailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, six thousand slain, and thirty thousand sold for slaves, at the price of four hundred and forty talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Gracian Cities.

Many arguments were used by Cleadas one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbear the destruction of Thebes. He prayed the King to believe that they were rather misled by giving hasty credit to false reports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his successour. He also besought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that City, yea, that his Ancestour Hercules was born therein: but all perswasions were fruitlesse, the very wherein offences are committed do greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at liberty Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in defence of the liberty of Greece against his father Philip. This noble woman being taken by a Thracian, and by him ravished, he threatneth to take her life unlesse she would confesse her treasure: she led that Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to look into the Well, she suddenly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had received into their City so many of the Thebans, as had had escaped and fled unto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captains; yet in the end, it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remain, and accepted of the banishment of the Captains; wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betook themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few dayes he invaded.

§. II.

How Alexander passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

WHen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellespont, and being ready to dis-imbark, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their own Territorie, or to burn, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possesse. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, neer unto Troy, where he offered a solemn sacrifice upon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, hee put to death without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his own as he suspected. He also took with him many of his tributary Princes, of whose fidelity he doubted; thinking by unjust cruelty to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended unto him, though agreeing very well with the justice of God; for all that he had planted, was soon after withered, and rooted up; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his own, and all manner of confusion followed his dead body to the grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexander's landing on Asia side was brought to Darius, he so much scorned the Army of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himself, as having stiled him his servant on a letter which he wrote unto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darius intitled himself King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) he gave order withall to his Lieutenants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander alive, whip him with rods, and then convey him to his presence: that they should sink his ships, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea; belike into Æthiopia, or some other unhealthfull part of Africa.

In this sort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the already-vanquished Macedonians: But the ill destinies of men bear them to the ground, by what strong confidence soever armed. The great numbers which he gathered together and brought in one heap into the field, gave rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, than any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men utterly unacquainted with dangers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevail against those of lesse courage than themselves, men that took more care how to embroider with gold and silver their upper garments, as if they attended the invasion but of the Sun-beams, than they did to arm themselves with yron and steel against the sharp pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, besides all these, even the opinion they had of their own numbers, of which every one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turn to fight, filled every of them with the care of their own safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their own breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians, as they came to fight, and thereby to enrich themselves with the gold and jewels of Persia, both which they needed; so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constrain them in assembling themselves for his service, but their own fears and cowardise, which in time of danger had most power over them, they only then obeyed, when their rebellion against so servile a passion did lastly and violently require it. For, saith Vegetius: Quemadmodum bene exercitatus miles praliam cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam scitum est in pugna usum amplius prodesse quàm vires; As the well-practised Souldier desires to come to battail, so the raw one fears it: for we must understand, that in fight it more availeth to have been accustomed unto the like, than only to have strength. What manner of men the Persians were, Alexander discovered in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that write his story, that it was hard to judge, whether his daring to undertake the conquest of an Empire so well peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which severeth the Territory of Troy from Propontis, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and bank of the River to defend, which Alexander was forced (as it were) to clime up unto, and scale from the Level of the water. Great resistance (saith Curtius) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander prevailed. But it seems to me, that the victory then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twenty thousand Persian foot-men, said to be slain, were rather kill'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosoms by resisting. For had those twenty thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horsemen, or after Plutarch, two thousand and five hundred horse-men, dyed with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lives at so small a rate, as with the losse of four and thirty of all sorts of his own. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encountred two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rhesaces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great fury, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Grecians in Darius his pay, holding themselves in one body upon a piece of ground of advantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance having been made, yet of Alexanders Army there fell but twelve Footmen, and two and twenty Horsemen?

§. III.

A digression concerning the defence of hard passages. Of things following the battail of Granick.

THe winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terrour upon all those of the lesser Asia, as he obtained all the Kingdoms thereof without a blow, some one or two Towns excepted. For in all invasions, where the Nations invaded have once been beaten upon a great advantage of the place, as in defence of Rivers, Streights, and Mountains, they will soon have perswaded themselves, that such an enemy upon equall termes and even ground, can hardly be resisted. It was therefore Machiavels counsell, That he which resolveth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the naturall difficultie of the wayes. One passage or other is commonly left unguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Country be distracted; and yet lightly some one place will be found that is defended very weakly. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italy? Yea, where shall we find that ever they kept out an invader? Yet are they such as (to speak briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that travail over them; but they give no security to those that lye behind them: for they are of too large extent. The towns of Lombardy perswaded themselves that they might enjoy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Dutchy of Milan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their own dwelling in those Mountains had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custody of the Alpes, Francis appeared in Lombardy, to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the lesse they had expected his arrivall. What shall we say of those Mountains, which lock up whole Regions in such sort, as they leave but one gate open? The Streights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyla, have seldome been attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how seldome (if ever) have they been attempted in vain? Xerxes, and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermopyla; Cyrus the yonger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide open; how strongly soever they had bin locked and barred, yet were those Countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the back-side. The defence of Rivers how hard a thing it is, we find examples in all histories that bear good witness. The deepest have many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may be passed by Boats, in case it be found a matter of difficulty to make a bridge. He that hath men enow to defend all the length of his own bank, hath also enow to beat his enemy; and may therefore doe better to let him come over, to his loss, than by striving in vain to hinder the passage, as a matter tending to his own disadvantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, having their means of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too good for them. Certainly, if a River were sufficient defence against an Army, the Isle of Mona, now called Anglesey, which is divided from North-Wales by an armie of the Sea, had been safe enough against the Romans invading it under conduct of Julius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to spend the time in making vessels to transport his forces, did assay the foords. Whereby he so amazed the enemies attending for ships and such like provision by Sea, that surely believing nothing could be hard or invincible to men, which came so minded to War, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Yet the Britaines were men stout enough, the Persians were very dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the River of Granick in face of the enemy; not marching higher to seek an easier way, nor labouring to convey his men over it by some safer means. For, having beaten them upon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no lesse of their reputation, than of their strength, leaving no hope of succour to the partakers and followers of such unable Protectors.

Soon after this victory he recovered Sardis, Ephesus, the Cities of the Trallians, and Magnesia, which were rendred unto him. The inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrie, he received with great grace, suffering them to be governed by their own laws. For he observed it well; Novum Imperium inchoantibus utilis clementia fama; It is commodious unto such as lay the foundations of a new Soveraignty, to have the fame of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wan Miletus, and by force mastered Halicarnassus, which because it resisted obstinately, he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queen, who had been cast out of all that she held (except the City of Alinda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her self unto him, and adopted him her son and successour; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. He then entred into Lycia, and Pamphylia, and obtained all the Sea coasts, and subjecting unto him Pisidia, he directed himself towards Darius (who was said to be advanced towards him with a marvellous Army) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Province of Asia the lesse, bordering upon the Sea, his first victory layed under his feet.

While he gave order for the government and setling of Lycia, and Pamphylia, they sent Cleander to raise some new Captains in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas, seated on the River Meander, which was abandoned unto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after forty dayes was given up: for so long time he gave them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till he came to a city called Gordium, the Regall seat, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was, that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to undoe, he cut it asunder with his sword. For there was an ancient prophecie did promise to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the manner how, so it were done, assumed to himself the fulfilling of the prophecie, by hewing it in pieces.

But before he turned from this part of Asia the lesse towards the east, he took care to clear the Sea coast on his back, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbus, Chio, and Coos: the charge whereof he committed unto two of his Captains, giving them such order as he thought to be most convenient for that service; and delivering unto them fifty Talents to defray the charge; and withall out of his first spoyl gotten, he sent three score Talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon. From Celenas he removed to Ancira, now called Angori, standing on the same River of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there he mustered his Army, and then then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themselves unto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where he left Calus Governor with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Here he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which heartned him greatly to passe on towards him; for of this only Captain he had more respect than of all the multitude by Darius assembled, and of all the Commanders he had besides. For so much hath the spirit of some one man excelled, as it hath undertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weals, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfuls of men against multitudes of equall bodily strength, contrived victories beyond all hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearfull passions of his own followers into magnanimity, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits have been stirred up in sundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast down again, to establish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Persons and States, to the same certain ends, which the infinite Spirit of the Universall, piercing, moving, and governing all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did, were marvellous, and would hardly have been undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to have invaded the lesser Asia, it is like enough that he would have contented himself with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of Indus, as this man did. The swift course of victory, wherewith he ran over so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may justly be imputed unto this, that he was never encountred by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, than desart places, and the meer length of tedious journies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to be admired for the workmanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulk. For certainly the things performed by Xenophon, discover as brave a spirit as Alexanders, and working no lesse exquisitely, though the effects were lesse materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But he that would find the exact pattern of a noble Commander, must look upon such as Epaminondas, that encountring worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselves, have by their singular vertue over-topped their valiant enemies, and still prevailed over those, that would not have yeelded one foot to any other. Such as these are, do seldome live to obtain great Empires. For it is a work of more labour and longer time, to master the equall forces of one hardy and well-ordered State, than to tread down and utterly subdue a multitude of servile Nations, compounding the body of a grosse unwieldy Empire. Wherefore these Duæ Potentiæ, men that with little have done much upon enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerors, to be rather admired for the substance of their actions, than the exquisite managing; exactnesse and greatnesse concurring so seldome, that I can find no instance of both in one, save onely that brave Roman, Cæsar.

Having thus farre digressed, it is now time that wee return unto our Eastern Conquerour; who is travelling hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recover the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he sent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persian Targets which hee had recovered in his first battell, upon which, by certain inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victory. Herein he well advised himself; for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gains in the Wars, as he doth of the spoils, shall never be long followed of those of the better sort. For men which are either well born, or well bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, do as often satisfie themselves with the purchase of glory, as the weak in fortune, and strong in courage, do with the gain of gold and silver.

The Governour of Cilicia hearing of Alexanders comming on, left some Companies to keep the Streights, which were indeed very defencible, and withall, as Curtius noteth, hee began overlate to prise and put in execution the Counsell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Wars advised him to waste all the provisions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, and alwayes to give ground to the Invader, till he found some such notable advantage as might assuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an invading Army is best broken, by delayes, change of diet, and want, eating ſometimes too little, and ſometimes too much, ſometimes repoſing themſelves in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. Theſe and the like ſudden alterations bring many diſeaſes upon all Nations out of their own Countries. Therfore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and ſleep, and, refuſing to give or take battell, had wearied them with his light horſe, as the Parthians afterward did the Romans, he might perchance have ſaved his own life, and his eſtate. For it was one of the greateſt incouragements given by Alexander, to the Macedonians, in the third and laſt fatall battell, that they were to fight with all the ſtrength of Perſia at once.

Xerxes, when he invaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, loſt only his men; but Darius being invaded by the Greeks, and fighting at home, by being beaten, loſt his Kingdome. Pericles though the Lacedæmonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawn to hazzard a battell: for the invaded ought evermore to fight upon the advantage of time and place. Becauſe we read Hiſtories to informe our underſtanding by the examples therein found, we will give ſome inſtances of thoſe that have periſhed by adventuring in their own Countries, to charge an invading Armie. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brink of their deſtruction.

Pompey was well adviſed for a while, when he gave Cæſar ground, but when by the importunity of his Captains he adventured to fight at Pharſalia, he loſt the battell, loſt the freedome of Rome, and his own life.

Ferdinand, in the Conqueſt of Naples, would needs fight a battell with the French to his confuſion, though it was told him by a man of ſound judgement, that thoſe Counſells which promiſe ſurety in all things, are honourable enough.

The Conſtable of France made fruſtrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fift when he invaded Provence, by waſting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; ſo did the Duke of Alva wearie the French in Naples, and diſſolve the boiſtrous Army of the Prince of Orange in the Low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrary to the advice of their Generall, would needs fight a battell with the Bourgonians, invading their Country, and could not be perſwaded to linger the time, and ſtay their advantage; but they loſt eight and twenty thouſand upon the place. Philip of Valois ſet upon King Edward at Cheſie; and King John (when the Engliſh were well-neer tired out, and would in ſhort time by an orderly purſuit have been waſted to nothing) conſtrained the black Prince with great fury, neer Poitiers, to joyn battell with him: But all men know what lamentable ſucceſſe theſe two French Kings found. Charles the fift of France made another kind of Fabian-Warfare; and though the Engliſh burnt and waſted many places, yet this King held his reſolution to forbear blowes, and followed his advice, which told him, That the Engliſh could never get his inheritance by ſmoak; and it is reported by Belloy and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to ſay of this Charles, that he wan from him the Dutchy of Guyen without ever putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpoſe to deſtroy, wiſe men grow ſhort-lived, and the charge of things is committed unto ſuch as either cannot ſee what is for their good, or know not how to put in execution any ſound advice. The courſe which Memnon had propounded, muſt in all appearance of reaſon have brought the Macedonian to a great perplexity, and made him ſtand ſtill a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more ſhamefull to return, or dangerous to proceed. For, had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia been waſted whileſt Alexander was far off; and the Streights of Cilicia been defended by Arſenes, Governour of that Province, with the beſt of his forces; hunger would not have ſuffered the enemy, to ſtay the triall of all means that might be thought upon, of forcing that paſſage: or if the place could not have been maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leiſure have been ſo throughly ſpoiled, that the heart of his Army ſhould have been broken, by ſeeking out miſeries by painfull travell.

But Arſenes leaving a ſmall number to defend the Streights, took the beſt of his Armie with him, to waſte and ſpoil the Country; or rather, as may ſeem, to find himſelf ſome work, by pretence of which he might honeſtly run further away from Alexander. Hee ſhould rather have adventured his perſon in cuſtody of the Streights, whereby he might perhaps have ſaved the Province; and in the mean time, all that was in the fields, would have been conveighed into ſtrong Towns. So ſhould his Army, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainment within walled Cities, and himself with his horse-men have had the lesse work in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the matter as he did, he gave the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders comming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Arsenes made all haste to joyn himself with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the defence, began to grow circumspect, and to think that surely their Generall, who gave as lost the Countrie behind their backs, had exposed themselves unto certain death, as men that were good for nothing else but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie (which honour they saw that Arsenes himself could well forbear) they speedily followed the foot-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Harvest. Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardise of his Enemies, and the whole Province that had been alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

§. IIII.

Of the unwarlike Army levied by Darius against Alexander. The unadvised courses which Darius took in this expedition. He is vanquished at Issus; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners: of some things following the battell of Issus.

IN the mean season Darius approched; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Army of more than two hundred and ninety thousand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Justine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at six hundred thousand.

The manner of his comming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of War, and like one that took more care to set out his glory and riches, than to provide for his own safety, perswading himself, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pomp and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire, which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priests, and after them three hundred and threescore and five young-men, answering the number of the dayes of the year, covered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Jupiter drawn with white Horses, with their Riders cloathed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sun: Next after these follow ten sumptuous Chariots, in-layed and garnish with silver and gold; and then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelve severall Nations, which the better to avoid confusion, did hardly understand each others language; and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitly to disorder all that followed them: in the tail of these Horses the Regiment of foot marched, with the Persians called immortall, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chains of gold, and their coats with the same metall imbroidered, whereof the sleeves were garnished with pearl, baits, either to catch the hungry Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incivility to cut, and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said; Sumptuosè indutus miles, se virtute superiorem aliis non existimet, cum in præliis oporteat fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man think that he exceedeth those in valour, whom he exceedeth in gay garments, for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparell they put on, that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this advice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Samnites in that fatall battell, wherein they all sware either to prevail or dye, thirty thousand of them having apparelled themselves in white garments, with high crests, and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all fear: Non enim cristas vulnera facere, & per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum; For these plumed crests would wound no body, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To second this Court-like company, fifteen thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breed the more terrour) and these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Than came Darius himself, himself, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serve, but they served their turns of these, by changing their massie-bodies into this portable and currant coyn. The head of this Chariot was set with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, covered with an open winged-Eagle of the same metall: The hinder part being raised high whereon Darius sate, had a covering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with silver, and their heads guilt; which they meant not to imbrue in the Macedonian bloud, for fear of marring their beauty. Hee had for the proper Guard of his own person, two hundred of the bloud Royall, bloud too Royall and precious to be spilt by any valorous adventure, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdy fellowes, like the Switzers, would have done him more service) and these were backt with thirty thousand foot-men, after whom again were led four hundred spare horses for the King, which if he had meant to have used, he would have marshalled somewhat neerer him.

Now followed the Rearward, the same being led by Sisygambis the Kings Mother, and by his wife, drawn in glorious Chariots, followed by a great train of Ladies their attendants on horse-beck, with fifteen Wagons of the Kings children, and the wives of the Nobility, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seem that Darius thought that the Macedonians had been Comedians or Tumblers; for this troop was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battells. Between these and a company of slight-armed slaves, with a world of Varlets, was the Kings treasure, charged on six hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proved, to pay the Macedonians. In this sort came the May-game-King into the field, incumbred with a most unnecessary train of Strumpets, attended with troups of divers Nations, speaking divers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled; and for the most part so effeminate, and so rich in gold and in garments, as the same could not but have encouraged the naked'st Nation of the world against them. Wee find it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimity, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Liberty, and whatsoever else hath been wont to move and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common-Souldier, in comparison of spoil and riches. The rich ships are boorded upon all disadvantage, the rich Towns are furiously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly invaded. Our English nation have attempted many places in the Indies, and run upon the Spaniards head-long, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistolets; which, had they bin put to it upon the like disadvantages in Ireland, or in any poor Country, they would have turned their Peeces and Pikes against their Commanders, contesting that they had bin brought without reason to the Butchery and slaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needy are alwayes adventurous, so plentie is wont to shun perill, and men that have well to live, do rather studie how to live well, I mean wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car on il n'y a rien a gaigner que des coups, volontiers il n'y va pas. No man makes haste to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his Soothsaiers, he would have satisfied himself by the out-sides of the Persians, and never have looked into the intrailes of Beasts for successe. For leaving the description of this second battel (which is indeed no-where well described, neither for the confusion and hasty running away of the Asians could it be) we have enough by the slaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to inform us what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that three score thousand Persian footmen were slain in this battell, with ten thousand of their horsemen; Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horsemen, and besides this slaughter, forty thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscarried but two hundred and four-score of all sorts, of which numbers Arrianus and other Historians cut off almost the one half; I do verily beleeve, that this small number rather died with the over-travell and pains-taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any favour remaining of the ancient valour of their fore-fathers, they would never have sold so good cheap, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daughters, and other the Kings children; had their own honour been valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safetie and his estate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Grecian of Athens had told him, when he made a view of his Army about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which he had assembled of divers Nations, richly attired, but poorly armed, would be found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would devoure than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to assail; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse squadrons, which they call their Phalanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and furnished with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make so little accompt of his delicate Persians, loving their ease and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertain (having so great abundance of treasure to do it withall) a sufficient number of the same Grecians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, he would repent him overlate, as taught by the miserable successe like to follow.

But this discourse was so unpleasing to Darius (who had bin accustomed to nothing so much as to his own praises, and to nothing so little as to hear truth,) as he commanded that this poor Grecian should be presently slain: who while he was a sundring in the Tormentors hand, used this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom he had given this good counsell, should assuredly revenge his death, and lay deserved punishment upon Darius for despising his advice.

It was the saying of a Wise man: Desperata ejus Principis salus est, cujus aures ita formatæ sunt, ut aspera quæ utilia, nec quicquam nisi jucundum accipiat; That Princes safetie is a desperate case, whose ears judge all that is profitable to be too sharp, and will entertain nothing that is unpleasant.

For liberty in counsell is the life and essence of counsell; Libertas consilii est ejus vita, & essentia, qua erepta consilium evanescit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the advice given him by the Grecian Souldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: But had they been Counsellers and directors in that War, as they were underlings and commanded by others, they had with the help of a good troup of horse-men bin able to have opposed the fury of Alexander, without any assistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was overthrown with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Grecians, under their Captain Amyntas, held firm, and marched away in order, in despight of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we read in Histories ancient and modern, what brave retraits have bin made by them, though the rest of the Army in which they have served, hath bin broken.

At the battail of Ravenna, where the Imperials were beaten by the French, a squadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off unbroken and undismayed; whom when Gaston de Foix, Duke of Nemours, and Nephew to Lewis the twelfth, charged, as holding the victory not entire by their escape, he was overturned and slain in the place. For it is truly said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers, fear them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminentis mali, opus ipsum quantumvis difficile aggrediuntur; They goe about the business it self, how hard soever it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the mischief hanging over their heads may bring: and as truly of those that know the wars but by hear-say; Quòd valentes sunt & prævalentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedunt; They have ability enough, and to spare, till dangers appear, but when perill indeed comes, they get them gone.

These Grecians also that made the retrait, advised Darius to retire his Army into the plain of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large fields and great Champains, he might have invironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to divide that his huge Army into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battails, and have brought no greater numbers at once than might have been well marshalled & conducted. But this counsell was so contrary to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inviron the Grecians which gave the advice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisedom of God doth not work alwayes by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdoms and Estates, by taking understanding from the Governours, so as they can neither give nor discern of Counsels. For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander upon a streightned piece of ground, neer unto the City of Issus, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the advice of Parmenio staied there, as in a place of best advantage) was utterly overthrown, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Grecians his followers had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their train of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, Jewels, and Honour. It is true, that both the Queen, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due unto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Jewels and rich Garments restored unto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Lady, and his Daughters of excellent form, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: only it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken flying from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who reigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobility of Persia in effect, fell into captivity; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to six thousand and two hundred talents of coin, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himself leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chief Captains, (casting the Crown from his head) hardly escaped.

After this overthrow given unto Darius, all Phœnicia (the City of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Governour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Good fortune followed him so fast that it trod on his heels; for Antigonus, Alexanders Lieutenant in Asia the lesse, overthrew the Cappadocians, Paphlagonians, and others lately revolted; Arisdemius, Darius Admiral, had his Fleet partly taken, and in part drowned by the Macedonians newly levied; the Lacedæmonians that warred against Antipater were beaten, four thousand of those Greeks which made the retrait at the last battail, forsaking both the party of Darius and of Alexander, and led by Amyntas into Egypt, to hold it for themselves, were buried there; for the time was not yet come to divide Kingdoms.

Alexander to honour Ephestion, whom he loved most, gave him power to dispose of the Kingdom of Zidon. A man of a most poor estate, that laboured to sustain his life being of the Royall bloud, was commended by the people unto him, who changed his Spade into a Scepter, so as he was beheld both a Beggar and a King in one and the same hour.

It was a good desire of this new King, when speaking to Alexander, he wisht that he could bear his prosperity with the same moderation, and quietnesse of heart, that he had done his adversity; but ill done of Alexander, in that he would not perform in himself that which he commended in another mans desire: for it was a sign that he did but accompany, and could not govern his felicity.

While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, importing the ransome of his Wife, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouchsafing in his direction, to stile Alexander King. It is true, that the Romans, after that they had received an overthrow by Pyrrhus, returned him a more scornfull answer upon the offer of peace, than they did before the triall of his force. But as their fortunes were then in the Spring, so that of Darius had already cast leaf, the one a resolved, well armed and disciplined Nation, the other cowardly and effeminate. Alexander disdained the offers of Darius, and sent him word, that he not onely directed his letter to a King, but to the King of Darius himself.

§. V.

How Alexander besieged and won the Citie of Tyre.

Alexander comming neer to the City of Tyre, received from them the present of a golden Crown, with great store of victuals, and other presents, which he took very thankfully, returning them answer, That he desired to offer a sacrifice sacrifice to Hercules, the Protector of their Citie, from whom he was descended. But the Tyrians like not his companie within their Walls, but tell him that the Temple of Hercules was seated in the old City adjoyning, now abandoned and desolate. To be short, Alexander resolved to enter it by force: and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the Iland whereon it was built, was eight hundred furlongs from the Main, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, hee filled the passage of the Sea between the Iland and the Main, which being more than once carried away by the strength of the Sea upon a storm of wind, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torn asunder; yet with the help of his Navie which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he overcame all difficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seven moneths in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the City, in respect whereof, and of the great loss of time and men, he put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those that escaped the first fury, to bee hanged on Crosses on the Sea-shore, and reserved for slaves (saith Diodore) thirteen thousand; Arrianus reckons them at thirty thousand. Arrian. Many more had died, had not the Zidonians, that served Alexander, conveyed great numbers away by shipping unto their own Cities.

Happy it was for Apollo that the Town was taken: for one of the Tyrians having Justin. lib. 18. dreamt, that this god meant to forsake the City, they bound him fast with a golden chain to the Idoll of Hercules, but Alexander, like a gracious Prince, loosened him again. It is true, that it was a notable enterprise and a difficult, but great things are made greater. For Nabuchodonosor had taken it before, and filled up the channell that lay between the Iland and the Main.

The government of this Territory he gave to Philotas, the Son of Parmenio; Cilicia, he committed to Socrates, and Andromachus Lieutenant under Parmenio; Ephestion had charge of the Fleet, and was directed to find Alexander at Gaza towards Egypt.

§. VI.

How Darius offered conditions of peace to Alexander. Alexander wins Gaza; and deals graciously with the Jewes.

IN the mean while Darius sends again to Alexander, sets before him all the difficulties of passing on towards the East, and layeth the losse of the last battell to the straightnesse of the place: he hoped to terrifie him by threatning to encompasse him in the plain Countries, he bids him to consider, how impossible it was to passe the Rivers of Euphrates, Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearfull things: for he that was now filled with nothing but fear, had arguments enovv of that nature to present unto another. All the Kingdomes betvveen the River of Alys, and the Hellespont, he offered him in Dovver vvith his beloved daughter. But Alexander answvered, That he offered him nothing but his own, and that which victory and his own vertue had possest him of; That he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, and that he having passed the Sea it self, disdained to think of resistance in transporting himself over Rivers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, That were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, if he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Egypt, and comming before Gaza, Getis a faithfull servant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Town with an obstinate resolution; at the siege whereof Alexander received a wound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone. Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battells, for he left so many of his Macedonians buried in the sands of Gaza, that he was forc'd to send for a new supply into Greece. Here it was that Alexander first began to change condition, and to exercise cruelty. For after that he had entred Gaza by assault, and taken Betis (whom Josephus calleth Babemesis) that was weakened with many wounds, and who never gave ground to the Assailants, he bored holes through his feet, and caused him to be drawn about the street, whilest he was as yet alive; who being as valiant a man as himself, disdained to ask him either life or remission of his torments.

And

And what had he to countenance this his tyrannie, but the imitation of his Ancestor Achilles, who did the like to Hector? It is true, that cruelty hath alwayes somewhat to cover her deformity.

Lib. 11. cap. ult. From Gaza (saith Josephus) he led his Army towards Jerusalem, a City, for the antiquity and great fame thereof, well known unto him while he lay before Tyre; He had sent for some supply thither, which Jaddus the high Priest, being subject and sworn to Darius, had refused him. The Jewes therefore fearing his revenge, and unable to resist, committed the care of their estates and safety to Jaddus, who, being taught by God, issued out of the City covered with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an upper garment of purple, embroidered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Levites in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a manner so unusuall, stately and grave, as Alexander greatly admired it. Josephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Priest, as reverencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it. Howsoever it was, I am of opinion, that he became so confident in his enterprise, and so assured of the successe after the prophecie of Daniel had been read unto him, wherein he saw himself, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or fear him. He confessed to Parmenio (saith Josephus) that in Dio a City of Macedon, when his mind laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleep such a person as Jaddus, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand, with assurance of victory. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantasie, he now beheld with his bodily eyes, wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrary to the practise of the Phœnicians, (who hoped to have sack'd and destroyed Jerusalem) he gave the Jewes all, and more than they desired, both of liberty and immunity, with permission to live under their own lawes, and to exercise and enjoy their own religion.

Alexander wins Egypt: and makes a journey to the Temple of Hammon.

FRom Jerusalem, Alexander turned again towards Egypt, and entred it, where Darius his Lieutenant, Astaces, received him, and delivered into his hand the City of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this we see that the King of Persia, who had more of affection than of judgment, gave to the valianteſt man he had, but the command of one City, and to the veriest coward the government of all Egypt. When he had set things in order in Egypt, he began to travell after God-head, towards Jupiter Hammon's, so foolish had prosperity made him. He was to passe over the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels back was spent, he could not but have perished, had not a marvellous showre of rain fallen upon him, when his Army was in extreme despair. All men that know Egypt, and have written thereof, affirme, That it never raines there: but the purposes of the Almighty God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when he had lost his way in those vast desarts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the Army, who making faster wing when they were followed, and fluttering slowly when the Army was cast back, guided them over those pathlesse sands to Jupiter's Temple.

Arrian lib. 3. Arrianus from the report of Ptolomy, the son of Lagus, layes, That he was led by two Dragons; both which reports may be a-like true. But many of those wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that have written the Story of Alexander; as, That an Eagle lay hovering directly over his head at the battell of Issus, That a Swallow flew about his head when he slept, and could not be scared from him, till it had wakened him at Halicarnassus, fore-shewing the treason of Amyntas, practised by Darius to have slain him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyrians made their defensive engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fell drops of blood, and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Macedonian Souldier, at the same time; That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the air. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West Indies have many such pretty tales; telling how they have been assisted in battell by the presence of our Lady, and by Angels riding on white horses with the like Romish miracles, which I think themselves do hardly believe. The strangest thing that I have read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battell at Novara, all the Dogs which followed the French Army, ran from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning upon them, as if they had been bred and fed by them all their lives, and in the morning following, Trivulzi and Tremoüille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by these imperiall Switzers utterly broken and put to ruine.

The place of this Idoll of Jupiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, between whom and the Territory of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Egypt, with the Mountains of Lybia, and the River of Nilus, are interjacent; and on the North he joyns it to a Nation called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, live (saith he) upon the spoyles of shipwrack: whereas the temple or grove of this Idoll hath no Sea neer it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia, these Nassamones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica. Ptol. Af. Tab. 3.

When Alexander came neer the place, he sent some of his Parasites before him to practise the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might be given in all things, agreeable to his mad ambition; who affected the title of Jupiters son. And so he was saluted, Son of Jupiter, by the Devils Prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some think) defective in the Greek tongue; For whereas he meant to say O paidion, he said O pai dios; that is, O Son of Jupiter, in stead of O dear Son: for which Grammaticall errour he was richly rewarded, and a rumour presently spred, that the great Jupiter had acknowledged Alexander for his own.

He had heard that Perseus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle, The one when he was employed against Gergon, The other against Anteus and Busiris; and seeing these men had derived themselves from the gods, why might not he? By this it seems that he hoped to make his followers and the world fools, though indeed he made himself one, by thinking to cover from the worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirm his followers in the belief of his Deity, he had practised the Priests to give answer to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Jupiter to honour Alexander as his Son.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a Bosse carried in a Boat, or by a Ram, or a Rams head, I see that many wise men have troubled themselves to find out; but as Arrianus speaks of Dionysius, or Liber Pater (who lived (saith S. Augustine) in Moses time) Ea quæ de diis veteres fabulis suis conscripsere, non sunt nimium curiosè perquirenda; We must not over-curiously search into the fables which the Antients have written of their gods. Curt. Lib. 4.

But this is certain and notable, that after the Gospel began to be preached in the World, the Devill in this and all other Idols became speechlesse. For, that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Tiberius Cæsar, and in the time of Trajan altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neer his Temple a Fountain called Fons solis (though Ptolomy in his third African Table sets it farther off) that at Mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noon as cold as any yce; to which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wels of like nature, and because it is reported by S. Augustine, by Diodore, Herodotus, Pliny, Mela, Solinus, Arrianus, Curtius, and others; and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night than in the day.

§. VIII.

How Alexander marching against Darius, was opposed very unskilfully by the Enemy.

FRom the Temple of Hammon he returned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Psammanes, who, belike understanding that he affected the title of Jupiters Son, told him that God was the Father-King of all men in generall; and refining the pride of this haughty King, brought him to say, That God was the Father of all mortall men, but that he acknowledged none for his children saving good men.

He gave the charge of the severall Provinces of Egypt to severall Governours, following the rule of his Master Aristotle, That a great Dominion should not be continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Egypt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner rank and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria upon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And having now setled (as he could) the estate of Egypt, with the kingdomes of the lesser Asia, Phœnicia and Syria, (which being but the pawns of Darius his ill fortune, one happy victory would readily have redeemed) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which passage though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without resistance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a river for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Persians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it self tels us, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian: for the violent course of the stream was such, as it drave before it many weighty stones, and those that moved not, but lay in the bottom, were so round and well polished by a continuall rolling, that no man was able to fight on so slippery a footing; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the river, otherwise than by joyning their hands, and enterlacing their arms together, making one weighty and entire body to resist the swift passage and furious race of the stream. Besides this notable help, the Channell was so deep towards the Eastern shore, where Darius should have made head, as the foot-men were enforc'd to lift their Bowes, and Arrows, and Darts, over their heads to keep them from being moistned, and made unserviceable by the Waters. But it was truly and understandingly sayd of Homer,

Curt. l. 4.

Talis est hominum terrestrium mens,
Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumq; Deorumq;.

The mindes of men are ever so affected,
As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the world, by the surfeit of mis-government have been subject to many grievous, and sometimes mortall diseases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it self into a burning and consuming Feaver, and thereby become frantick and without understanding, foreshewing manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Eastern shores of Tigris, without any other difficulty, than that of the nature of the place; where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the Passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himself to the Macedonians, followed with certain companies of Horse-men, as if with uneven forces he durst have charged them on even ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, he forsook the advantage which no valour of his enemies could easily have overcome. But it is commonly seen, that fearfull and cowardly men do ever follow those wayes and counsels, whereof the opportunity is already lost.

It is true that he set all provisions afire wherewith the Macedonians might serve themselves over Tigris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse, when unseasonable. For now was Alexander so well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competency of the Army which he conducted. Those things also which he sought to waste, Alexander being now in sight, were by his Horse-men saved and recovered. This Mazeus might have done some dayes before at good leasure; or at this time with so great a strength of Horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, leaving the strength of their foot out of sight and far behind.

The new provisions of Darius. Accidents foregoing the battell of Arbela.

Darius, upon Alexanders first return out of Egypt, had assembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scythians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (saith Curtius) that rather served to make up the names of men, than to make resistance. Arrianus hath numbred

numbred them with their Leaders, and finds of foot-men of all sorts ten hundred thousand, and of horse four hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some few Elephants. Curtius, who musters the Army of Darius at two hundred thousand foot, and neer fifty thousand horse, comes (I think) neerer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that he had gathered together of all sorts some three or four hundred thousand, with which he hoped in those fair plains of Assyria, to have over-born the few numbers of the invading Army. But it is a rule in the Philosophy of the War;

In omni prælio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium solent vera-ciorem victoriam; In every battell skill and practice do more towards the victory, than multitude and rude audacity.

While Alexander gave rest to his army after the passage over Tigris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moon, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) took it for a certain presage of their overthrow and destruction, insomuch as they began not only to murmur, but to speak it boldly, That for the ambition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his father, and would needs be called the son of Jupiter, they should all perish; For he not only enforc'd them to make war against Worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountains, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being ready to march forward, made a halt, & to quiet the minds of the multitude, he called before him the Egyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be assured that this defection of the Moon was a certain presage of good successe; for, that it was naturall they never imparted to the common people, but reserved the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorry Almanack-maker had been no small fool in those daies.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Cæsar made good use, when he fought against Ariovistus and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the casting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moon, they should certainly lose the battell, Cæsar forc'd them to abide it, though they durst not give it; wherein having their minds already beaten by their own superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole Army in effect perished.

These Egyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Grecians were under the aspect of the Sun, the Persians of the Moon; and therefore the Moon failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of failing, and their glory of being obscured. This judgement of the Egyptian Priests being noysed through all the Army, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though devised since, was well observed then: Exercitum terrore plenum Dux ad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captain lead his Army to the fight, when it is possessed with matter of terrour.

It is truly observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by superstition; yea, wee find it in all stories, and often in our own, that by such inventions, devised tales, dreams, and prophecies, the people of this Land have been carried head-long into many dangerous tumults and insurrections, and still to their own losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neer the Persian Army, certain letters were surprized, written by Darius to the Grecians, perswading them for great summes of mony, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the advice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his fair Wife, oppress with sorrow, and wearied with travell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who upon the first bruit, suspected that some dishonourable violence had been offered her; but being satisfied by an Eunuch of his own that attended her, of Alexander's kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortall Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to confer it on so just and continent an enemy as Alexander, to whom he once again before the last tryall by battell offered these conditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliver up and resign all Asia the less, and with Egypt, all those kingdoms between the Phœnician sea, and the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ransome of his Mother, and his other Daughters, 30 thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, he would leave his ſon Ochus in hoſtage: To this they ſought to perſwade Alexander by ſuch arguments as they had. Alexander cauſing the Embaſſadors to be removed, adviſed with his Councell, but heard no man ſpeak but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perſwaded him to accept of theſe fair conditions. He told him, that the Empire between Euphrates and Helleſpont was a fair addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Perſian priſoners was a great cumber, and the treaſure offered for them of far better uſe than their perſons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable that if he had followed his advice, and bounded his ambition within thoſe limits, he might have lived as famous for vertue as for fortune, and left himſelf a Succeſſor of able age to have enjoyed his eſtate, which afterward indeed he much enlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himſelf: who to aſſure themſelves of what they had uſurped upon his iſſues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few years after. The truth is, That Alexander in going ſo far into the Eaſt, left behind him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a juſt and prudent Prince, a Prince temperate, adviſed and gratefull: and being taught new leſſons by abundance of proſperity, became a lover of wine, of his own flattery, and of extreme cruelty. Yea, as Seneca hath obſerved, the taint of one unjuſt ſlaughter, amongſt many, defaced and withered the flouriſhing beauty of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Perſian Embaſſadors ſtay his anſwer, which was to this effect, That whatſoever he had beſtowed on the wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his own naturall clemency and magnanimity, without all reſpect to their Maſter, but thanks to an enemy was improper: that he made no Wars againſt adverſity, but againſt thoſe that reſiſted him; not againſt Women and Children, but againſt armed enemies: and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great ſummes of money to perſwade his friends to attempt upon his perſon, he had reaſon to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet he could not (were it otherwiſe and faithfull) reſolve in haſte to accept the ſame, ſeeing Darius had made Warre againſt him, not as a King with Royall and overt-force, but as a Traytor by ſecret and baſe practice; That for the Territory offered him, it was already his own, and if Darius could beat him back again over Euphrates, which he had already paſt, he would then beleeve that he offered him ſomewhat in his own power: Otherwiſe he propounded to himſelf for the reward of the War which he had made, all thoſe kingdomes as yet in Darius poſſeſſion; wherein, whether he were abuſed by his own hopes or no, the battell which he meant to fight in the day following ſhould determine. For in concluſion, he told them, that he came into Aſia to give, & not to receive; That the heavens could not hold two Suns: and therefore if Darius would be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance be perſwaded to give him conditions fit for a ſecond Perſon, and his Inferiour.

The battell of Arbela: and that it could not be ſo ſtrongly fought as report hath made it.

WIth this anſwer the Embaſſadors return; Darius prepares to fight, and ſends Mazeus to defend a paſſage, which he never dared yet ſo much as to hazzard. Alexander conſults with his Captains, Parmenio perſwades him to force Darius his Camp by night; ſo that the multitude of enemies might not move terrour in the Macedonians being but few. Alexander diſdains to ſteal the victory, and reſolves to bring with him the day-light, to witneſſe his valour. But it was the ſucceſſe that made good Alexanders reſolution, though the counſell given by Parmenio was more ſound: For it is a ground in War, Si pauci neceſſariò cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, conſilium eſt noctis tempore belli fortunam tentare, Notwithſtanding upon the view of the multitude at hand, he ſtaggers and trenches himſelf upon a ground of advantage, which the Perſian had abandoned: And whereas Darius for fear of ſurpriſe had ſtood with his Army in armour all the day, and forborn ſleep all the night, Alexander gave his men reſt and ſtore of food; for reaſon had taught him this Rule in the Warre, In pugna Milites validiùs reſiſtunt, ſi cibo potuque refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinſecus magis magis pugnat, quàm ferrum experiùs; Souldiers do the better stand to it in fight if they have their bellies full of meat and drink; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steel without.

The numbers which Alexander had, saith Arrianus, were forty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse; these belike were of the European Army; for he had besides both Syrians, Indians, Egyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He used but a short speech to his Souldiers to encourage them; and I think that he needed little Rhetorick; for by the two former battels upon the Rivers of Granick, and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true saying, Victoria victoriam parat, animumque victoribus auget, & adversariis adimit; One victory begets another, and puts courage into those that have already had the better, taking spirit away from those that have been beaten.

Arrianus and Curtius make large descriptions of this battell, fought at Gaugamela; They tell us of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being overthrown, who led the left wing; That Alexander's Rear-guard was broken, and his carriages lost; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both sides, Fortune her self was long unresolved on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, that Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But to conclusion, Curtius delivers in account but three hundred dead Macedonians, in all this terrible daies work; saying, That Ephestion, Perdiccas, and others of name were wounded. Arrianus finds not a third part of this number slain; of the Persians there fell forty thousand (saith Curtius) thirty thousand according to Arrianus, Ninety thousand, if we beleeve Diodorus. But what can we judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battels, the Persians upon the first charge ran away, and that the Macedonians pursued? For if of those four or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, every man had cast but a dart or a stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so cathe a rate, as six or seven hundred men in three notorious battels. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the banks of Euphrates, and had armed but fifty or threescore thousand of this great multitude, only with Spades, (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to have past that River so easily, much lesse the River of Tigris. But as a man whose Empire God in his providence had determined, he abandoned all places of advantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so far into the bowels of his Kingdome, as all hope and possibility of escape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented unto them the choice, either of death or victory, to which election Darius could no way constrain his own, seeing they had many large Regions to run into from those that invaded them.

§. XI.

Of things following the battell of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Susa.

Darius after the rout of his Army recovered Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded unto them that ran after him his purpose of making a retrait into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedy of spoyl and riches, would rather attempt Babylon, Susa, and other Cities filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobility rather obeyed than approved.

Alexander soon after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred to him: for the fear which conducted Darius, took nothing with it but shame and dishonour. He that had been twice beaten, should rather have sent his treasure into Media, than brought it to Arbela, so neer the place where he abid the comming of his enemies; if he had been victorious, he might have brought it after him at leasure; but being overcome, he knew it unpossible to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold from the pursuing Enemy, seeing himself, at the overthrow he had in Cilicia, cast the Crown from his head, to run away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et præterita magis reprehendi possunt quàm corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past.

From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus, in whom Darius had most confidence, rendred himself, his Children and the Citie. Also the Captain of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowers, burnt Frankincense upon Altars of silver as Alexander passed by, and delivered unto him whatsoever was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldaan Astrologers) followed this Captain in great solemnitie to entertain their new King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poor in warlike furniture. Between these (though not greatly to be feared) and himself, Alexander caused his Macedonian foot-men to march. When he entred the Castle, he admired the glorie thereof, and the aboundance of treasure therein found, amounting to fifty thousand talents of silver uncoyned. The Citie it self I have elsewhere described, with the Walls, the Towers, the Gates and Circuit, with the wonderfull place of pleasure about two miles in Circuit, surrounded with a wall of fourscore foot high, and on the top thereof (being under-born with Pillars) a Grove of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is said that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queen and other Princesses might walk privately therein. In this Citie, rich in all things, but most of all in voluptuous pleasures, the King rested himself and the whole Army four and thirty dayes, consuming that time in banquetting, and in all sorts of effeminate exercise; which so much softned the minds of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the severe discipline of war, which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of painfull travell, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

An. 3. Alex.

Here it was that those bands of a thousand Souldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed over them, who thereupon were stiled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honour those Captains which were found by certain selected Judges to have deserved best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies consisted but of five hundred. Certainly the drawing down of the foot-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Mtrshall Monluc) that the title and charge of a Captain hath been bestowed on every Picque-Bœuf or Spurn-Cow; for when the Captains of foot had a thousand Souldiers under one Ensigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honourable, and the kings were lesse charged, and far better served. King Henry the eighth of England never gave the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of known valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitie Commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe; for Antipater sent him six thousand foot, and five hundred horse out of Macedon; of Thracians three thousand foot, and the like number of horse; and out of Greece four thousand and four hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly strengthened: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought again, De quitter la plume pour dormir sur la dure; To change from soft beds to hard boords.

He left the Castle and Citie of Babylon, with the Territories about it, in charge with three of his own Captains, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Appolidorus; to supply all wants, a thousand talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the Citie unto him, he gave him the title of his Lieutenant over all, and took with him Bagistines that gave up the Castle, and having distributed to every Souldier a part of the Treasure, he left Babylon, and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence he went on toward Susa in Persia, the same which Ptolomy, Herodotus, and Elianus call Memnonia, situate on the river Eulœus, a Citie sometime governed by Daniel the Prophet. Abulites also, Governor of this famous Citie, gave it up to the Conqueror, with fiftie thousand talents of silver in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this sort did those Vassals of fortune, lovers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person, (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their own peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well advised, that whatsoever titles he gave to the Persians, yet he left all places of importance in trust with his own Captains, to wit, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, with other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would have returned unto their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to their own Kings, are never to be used alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertain them, nor ever to be trusted with the defences of any frontier-Town, or Fortresse of weight, by the rendring whereof they may redeem their liberty and estates lost. Hereof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Navarra, being banished out of Spain, was trusted with Fonterabe, in the year 1523.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furnish'd the King from Babylon; and while he stayed four and thirty dayes at Babylon, Abulites might have holpen him from Susa; and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieved him, for the great masse of Treasure was layd up in that City. But who hath sought out and friended fearfull adversity? It is certain, that benefits bind not the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, do in all changes of fortune onely consult the conservation of their own greatnesse.

The government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, he committed to his own Macedonians, making Abulites, who rendred it unto him, his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giving them titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to assure the place; and Darius mother and her children to repose themselves.

It is said that Charles the fift, having promised Charles of Bourbon the government of Marseilles, if he could have forc'd it, and whereof he made sure accompt, told some of his nearest Counsellors, that he meant nothing lesse than the performance of that promise, because he should thereby have left the Duke (revolted from his Master) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour.

How Alexander came to Persepolis and burnt it.

FRom Susa Alexander leadeth his Army toward Persepolis, and when he sought to passe those Mountains which sunder Susiana and Persia, he was soundly beaten by Ariobarzanes, who defended against him those Streights, called Pylæ Persidis, or Susidis, and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forc'd to save himself by retrait, causing his Foot to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountain top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Country, discovered unto him, and came thereby suddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforc'd to fight upon even ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) he returned and gave a second charge upon the Macedonians, wherein he was slain. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the year 1515, find a way over the Alpes, the Switzers undertaking to defend all the passages, who, if their footmanship had not saved them upon the Kings descent on the other side, they had been ill payd for their hard lodging on those Hils.

Four thousand Greeks, saith Curtius (Justine numbers them but at eight hundred) having bin taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in sight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their hands, noses, ears, and other members, as they could no way have been known to their Country-men, but by their voyces, to each of these Alexander gave three hundred Crowns, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to live upon.

Tiridates, one of Darius his false-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approach, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and prayed him to double his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoyl the Kings treasure. This City was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexanders arrivall, and they that stayed followed the worst counsell; for all was left to the liberty of the souldiers, to spoyl and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had been laid in the ballance with Persepolis, would have weighed it down. Babylon indeed, and Susa, were very rich; but in Persepolis lay the bulk and main store of the Persians. For after the spoyl that had been made of money, curious plate, bullion, images of gold and silver, and other Jewels, there remained to Alexander himself one hundred and twenty thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand

Macedonians

Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in Susa, and gave the same formall honour to the traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his own. The body of his Army he left here for thirty daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenio and Craterus, and with a thousand horse, and certain troups of chosen foot, he would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had covered, a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise but as Seneca saies; Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare: He hath not a will to go, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise, That when his Souldiers cryed out against him, because they could not endure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficulty, through the snow, that Alexander forsook his horse, and led them the way. But what can be more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremity, thereby to shew how well himself can endure it? His walking on foot did no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime forbearing to drink, did quench their thirst, that could lesse endure it. For mine own little judgement, I shall rather commend that Captain that makes careful provision for those that follow him, and that seeks wisely to prevent extreme necessitie, than those witlesse arrogant fools, that make the vaunt of having endured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glory and importance.

We find in all the Wars that Cæsar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the provision of victuals was their first care. For it was true saying of Coligni, Admirall of France; That who so will shape that Beast (meaning War) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians that were most amorous of his vertues, complain, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberality, of his clemency towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, were drowned in drink; That he smothered in carowsing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reverend Throne of the greatest King, into the company and familiarity of base Harlots, he began to be despised both of his own and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, he caused the most sumptuous and goodly Castle and City of Persepolis to be consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrary, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perswasion to the Asians to think hardly of him, and thereby alien their hearts; for they might well beleeve that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing lesse than (after such vastation) to hold their possession. Per vinolentiam crudelitas sequitur, Cruelty doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For it so fell out soon after, and often, in Alexander.

Curt. Lib. 5.

Sen. Epist. 8. 4.

§. XIII.

The Treason of Bessus against Darius. Darius his death.

ABout this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to find Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Army, which he meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexander's comming on, with whom (trusting to such companies as he had, which was numbred at thirty or forty thousand) he determined once again to try his fortune. He therefore calls together his Captains and Commanders, and propounds unto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe, used silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of War, who had sometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the yce, and protesting that he could never be beaten by any adversity of the Kings, from the faith which he had ever ought him, with firm confidence, that all the rest were of the same condition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) hee approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Naburzanes and Bessus, whereof the later was governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master; and therefore advised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor fortune had in all things declared themselves to be an enemy: this preamble Naburzanes used, and in conclusion advised the election of his fellow Traitor Bessus, with promise that the warres ended, the Empire should again be restored to Darius. The King swollen with disdain, prest towards Naburzanes to have slain him, but Bessus and the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the mean while Naburzanes with-drew himself, and Bessus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Army. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull servant, perswaded him to be advised and serve the time, seeing Alexander was at hand, and that he would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made; which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded unto. Bessus makes his submission, and attends the King, who removes his Army. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of four thousand Greeks, which had in all the former battels served Darius with great fidelity, and alwayes made the rereward in spight of the Macedonians, offered himself to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Bessus; but it was not his destiny to follow their advice who from the beginning of the Warre gave him faithfull counsell, but hee inclined still to Bessus, who told him, that the Greeks, with Patron their Captain, were corrupted by Alexander, and practised the division of his faithfull servants. Bessus had drawn unto him thirty thousand of the Army, promising them all those things, by which the lovers of the World and themselves are wont to be allured, to wit, riches, safety, and honour.

Now the day following Darius plainly discovered the purposes of Bessus, and being overcome with passion, as thinking himself unable to make head against these ungratefull and unnaturall Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull servant to depart from him, and to provide for himself. In like sort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all save a few of his Eunuches; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base cowards, durst not undertake his defence against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had four thousand Greeks to joyn with him, who had been able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which forsakes himself, no man follows. It had been far more Man-like, and King-like, to have dyed in the head of those four thousand Greeks, which offered him the disposition of their lives, (to which Artabazus perswaded him) than to have lyen bewailing himself on the ground, and suffering himself to be bound like a slave by those ambitious Monsters that laid hand on him, whom neither the consideration of his former great estate, nor the honour he had given them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could move to pity: no, nor his present adversity, which above all things should have moved them, could pierce their viperous and ungratefull hearts. Vain it was indeed to hope it; for infidelity hath no compassion.

Now Darius, thus forsaken, was bound and laid in a Cart, covered with hides of Beasts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not be discovered; and to adde despight and derision to his adversity, they fastned him with Chains of Gold, and so drew him on among their ordinarie Carriages and Carts. For Bessus and Naburzanes perswaded themselves to redeem their lives and the Provinces they held, either by delivering him a prisoner to Alexander, or, if that hope failed, to make themselves kings by his slaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Arms. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most just, to pardon so strange villanie, yea, though against a Prince purely Heathenish and an Idolater.

Alexander having knowledge that Darius was retired towards Bactria, and durst not abide his comming, hastened after him with a violent speed, and because he would not force his footmen beyond their powers, he mounted on horse-back certain selected companies of them, and best armed, and with six thousand other horse, rather ran than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus, and secretly forsook him, gave knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Bessus took, and how neer he was at hand: for many men of worth daily ran from him. Hereupon Alexander again doubled his pace, and his Vant-guard being discovered by Bessus his Rear, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, perswading him to mount thereon, and to save himself. But the unfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betrayed him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and slew two poor Servants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercie of the Macedonian swords.

Polystratus

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursuit of the vanquished prest with thirst, as hee was refreshing himself with some water that he had discovered, espying a Cart with a Team of wounded beasts breathing for life, and not able to move, searched the same, and therein found Darius bathing in his own bloud: And by a Persian Captive which followed this Polystratus, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of his barbarous Tragedy. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying men ignorant of the living God can be comforted) that he cast not out his last sorrowes unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traytors, which had dealt no lesse unworthily than cruelly with him, recommending their revenge to Alexander by this messenger, which he besought him to pursue, not because Darius had desired it, but for his own honour, and for the safety of all that did, or should after wear Crowns. He also having nothing else to present, rendred thanks to Alexander for the Kingly grace used towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortal gods to submit unto him the Empire of the whole World. As he was thus speaking impatient death pressing out his few remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, wherewith to desire the gods to reward his compassion.

§. XIV.

IT was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travels were neer an end, every man preparing for his return. Hereof when Alexander had knowledge, he was greatly grieved, for the bounded earth sufficed not his boundlesse Ambition. Many arguments he therefore used to draw on his Army farther into the East, but that which had most strength, was, that Bessus, a most cruell traytor to his Master Darius, having at his devotion the Hyrcanians and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians should return) make himself Lord of the Persian Empire, and enjoy the fruits of all their former travels. In conclusion he wan their consents to go on: which done, leaving Craterus with certain Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with six thousand horse in Parthenia, he enters not without some opposition into Hyreania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certain passages for a while. He passeth the river of Zioberis, which taking beginning in Parthia, dissolves it self in the Caspian Sea: it runneth under the ledge of Mountains, which bound Parthia & Hyrcania, where hiding it self under ground for three hundred furlongs, it then riseth again, and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta, or Zeudracarta, the same City which Ptolomy writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, he rested fifteen dayes, banquetting and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with others of his best followers, submit themselves to Alexander, and were restored to their places and governments. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved and constant faith to his master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and five hundred Greeks, the remainder of all those that had served Darius. He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end, they render themselves simply without promise or composition: he pardons all but the Lacedemonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader having slain himself. He was also wrought (though to his great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joyned with Bessus to murder Darius.

§. XV.

Of Thalestris Queen of the Amazons; where, by way of digression, it is shewed, that such Amazons have been and are.

HEre it is said that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queen of the Amazons, came to visit him, and her sute was, (which she easily obtained) that she might accompany him till she were made with child by him: which done (refusing to follow him into India) she returned into her own Country.

Plutarch

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thalestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But indeed, the letters of Alexander himself to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may justly breed suspition of the whole matter as forged. Much more justly may we suspect it as a vain tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his books to Lysimachus (then King of Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage, was laught at by the King for inserting such newes of the Amazons, and Lysimachus himself had never heard of. One that accompanied Alexander, took upon him to write his acts, which to amplifie, He told how the King had fought single with an Elephant, and slain it. The King hearing such stuff, caught the book, and threw it into the river of Indus, saying, That it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inserting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as we believe & know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit unto writers making mention of such Amazons, whether it were true or false that they met with Alexander, as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. Therefore I will here take leave to make digression, as well to shew the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some modern discoverers touching these warlike Women, because not only Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether or no there were any such kind of people. Julius Solinus seats them in the North parts of Asia the lesse. Pom. Mela finds two Regions filled with them; the one on the River Thermodoon, the other neer the Caspian Sea; Quas (saith he) Sauromatidas appellant; Which the people call Sauromatidas. The former of these two had the Cimerians for their Neighbours; Certum est (saith Vadianus, who hath commented upon Mela) illos proximos Amazonibus fuisse; It is certain that the Cimerians were the next Nations to the Amazons. Ptolomy sets them farther into the Land North-wards, neer the Mountains Hippaci, not far from the Pillars of Alexander. And that they had Dominion in Asia it self toward India, Solinus and Pliny tell us, Where they governed a people called the Pandeans, or Padeans, so called after Pandea the Daughter of Hercules, from whom all the rest derive themselves. Claudian affirmes, That they commanded many Nations: For he speaks (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Sol.c.27.& 64

Ptol.lib.6. Asia Tab.2.

Plin.l.6.c.20.

——Medis levibusque Sabais
Imperat hic Sexus: Reginarumque sub armis, Barbaria pars magna jacet.

Claud. de rap. Proserpinæ.

Over the Medes, and light Sabeans reigns
This female sex: and under arms of Queen,
Great part of the Barbarian Land remains.

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (saith he) than those which kept the banks of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea, neer Heraclium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom he tels us that the Scythians call Oorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or men-killers. And that they made incursion into Asia the lesse, sackt Ephesus, and burt the Temple of Diana, Manethon, and Aventinus report, which they performed forty years after Troy was taken. At the siege of Troy it self we read of Penthesilea, That she came to the succour of Priamus.

Marciad.1. l.3.

Am. Marcellinus gives the cause of their inhabiting upon the River of Thermodoon, speaking confidently of the wars they made with divers Nations, & of their overthrow.

L.22.c.7.

Plutarch in the life of Theseus, out of Philochorus, Hellenicus, and other ancient Historians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queen of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Theseus, though some affirm, That Theseus himself got her by stealth, when she came to visit him aboord his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all confessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speaks of certain companies of the Amazons, that came to ayd the Albanians against the Romans, by whom after the battell, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken up: and he saith farther, That these women entertain the Gela and Lelages once a year, Nations inhabiting between them and the Albanians.

But

But to omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times, Fran. Lopez, who hath written the navigation of Orellana, which he made down the river of Amazons from Peru, in the year 1542. (upon which river, for the divers turnings, he is said to have sailed six thousand miles) reports from the relation of the said Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That he both saw those women, and fought with them, where they sought to impeach his passage towards the East-Sea.

Hist. Ind. part. 1. c. 28.

It is also reported by Ulrichus Schmidel, that in the year 1542. when he sailed up the Rivers of Paragua and Parabal, that he came to a King of that Country, called Scherves, inhabiting under the Tropick of Capricorn, who gave his Captain Ernando Rieffete, a Crown of silver, which he had gotten in fight from a Queen of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopez, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling us, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burn off their right breasts, and live apart from men, save at one time of the year, when they feast and accompany them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesse a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, nineteen degrees to the Southward of the line: and that these women are the strongest Guards of this Emperour, all the East-Indian Portugals know.

I have produced these authorities in part, to justifie mine own relation of these Amazons, because that which was delivered me for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how upon the River of Papamena (since the Spanish discoveries called Amazons) that these women still live and govern, was held for a vain and unprobable report.

§. XVI.

How Alexander fell into the Persian Luxurie: and how he further pursued Bessus.

NOw as Alexander had begun to change his conditions after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his prosperitie had so much over-wrought his vertue, as he accounted clemencie to be but basenesse, and the temperance which he had used all his life-time, but a poor and dejected humour, rather becomming the instructers of his youth, than the condition and state of so mighty a King as the World could not equall. For he perswaded himself that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods; he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground and adore him, he ware the robes and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitie should do the like: he entertained in his Court and Camp, the same shameless rabble of Curtisans, and Sodomiticall Eunuchs, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and detested mãners of the Persians, whom he had vanquished. So licentious is felicity, as notwithstanding that he was fully perswaded, that the gods whom he served (detesting the vices of the invaded) assisted him in all attempts against them, he himself, contrary to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soever it were, could not be but fearful unto him by neglecting it) became by imitation, & not by ignorance or education, a more foul and fearfull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannie he vaunted to have delivered so many Nations. Yea those that were dearest and neerest unto him, began to be ashamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornfull discourse, That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Darius his licentious Courtiers. That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many travels, more impoverished in their vertues, than inriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the baser slaves. Neither were these opinions so reserved, but that the noise of them came to his ears. He therefore with great gifts sought to pacifie the better sort, and those of whose judgements he was most jealous, and making it known to the Armie, that Bessus had assumed the title of a King, and called himself Artaxerxes, and that he had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, he had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on, to the end that all already gotten, might not with themselves (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much unlike the warfare of the French) having commanded every mans fardels to be brought into the Market-place, he, together with his own, caused all to be consumed with fire. Certainly, this could not but have proved most dangerous unto him, seeing the common Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painfull travells, and with their bloud, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happy temerity overcome all things. As he was in his way, newes came to him, that Satribarzanes, whom he had established in his former government over the Arians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he sought him out; but the Rebell, hearing of his coming, fled to Bessus, with two thousand Horse. He then went on towards Bessus, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the advantage of a strong wind, won the passage over an high and unaccessable Rock, which was defended against him with thirteen thousand foot. For the extremity of the Flame and smoak forced them from the place, otherwise invincible. I saw in the third civill warre of France, certain Caves in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rocks, which we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certain bundles of straw, let down by an yron chain, and a waighty stone in the middest, those that defended it, were so smothered, as they rendred themselves, with their plate, money, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three years before my arrivall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie-people, who did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the wind in those parts being alwayes East) so as notwithstanding their flying from the smoak, there was not any one that escaped. Sir John Burrowes also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the West-Indies, by having the grasse fired behind him; but the smoak being timefully discovered, he recovered the Sea-shore with the losse of sixteen of his men. I remember these things, but to give caution to those that shall in times to come invade any part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burn down the grasse and siege to the East of them; they may otherwise, without any other enemy than a handfull of straw set one fire, dye the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hive.

§. XVII.

A Conspiracie against Alexander. The death of Philotas and Parmenio.

Alexander was, after he parted hence, no where resisted, till he came into Aria, to the East of Bactria, where the chief City of that Province, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the revolt of Satribarzanes, but in the end he received the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Army was re-enforced with a new supply of five thousand and five hundred foot, and neer five hundred Horse, out of Greece, Thessalie, and other places. His journey out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For having (as all his Historians tell us) a determination to find Bessus in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyrcania, from thence he wanders Northwards towards the obscure Mardi, upon the Caspian-Sea, and thence over the Mountain Coronus into Aria and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the sonne of Parmenio was accused, as accessary, if not principall. This Dimnus, having (I know not upon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nichomachus, a young man whom he loved, into the same treason. The Youth, although he was first bound by oath to secrecy, when he heard so foul a matter uttered, began to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have slain him for security of his own life. So, constrained by fear, he made shew as if hee had been won by perswasion; and by seeming at length to like well of the businesse, he was told more at large what they were that had undertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of rank, whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise) reckoned up to Nichomachus. Nichomachus had no sooner freed himself from the company of this traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his own brother Ceballinus with the whole History: whereupon it was agreed between them, that Ceballinus (who might with least suspition) should go to the Court, and utter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole businesse, desiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which he promised to do, but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas never brake with the King about the matter; but still excused himself to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himself to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed between Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himself that this concealment of the treason, argued his hand to have been in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question than this: Wherein have I so offended thee, that thou shouldest think Philotas more worthy to be King than I? Dimnus perceiving when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had so wounded himself, that he lived no longer, than to give his last groan in the Kings presence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspition, which his silence might justly breed. His answer was, That when this practice was revealed unto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to bee but frivolous, did forbear to acquaint Alexander therewithall, untill hee might have better information. This errour of his, (if it were onely an errour) although Alexander, for the notorious services of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himself, had freely pardoned and given him his hand for assurance, yet by the instigation of Craterus, he again swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemies his Judges. Curtius gives a note of Craterus in this businesse; How he perswaded himself, that hee could never find a better occasion to oppresse his private enemy, than by pretending piety, and dutie towards the King. Hereof a Poet of our own hath given a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas:

See how these great men cloathe their private hate,
In these fair colours of the publike good,
And, to effect their ends, pretend the State,
As if the State by their affection stood?
And, arm'd with power and Princes jealousies,
Will put the least conceit of discontent
Into the greatest rank of treacheries,
That no one action shall seem innocent;
Yea, valour, honour, bountie, shall be made
As accessaries unto ends unjust:
And even the service of the State must lade
The needfull'st undertaking with distrust;
So that base vilenesse, idle Luxurie,
Seem safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were so, that the King, following the advice of Craterus, had resolved the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very evening of the same night in which he was apprehended, hee called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotas was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him began to bind him, he cryed out upon the King in these words, O Alexander, the malice of mine Enemies hath surmounted thy mercy, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were urged against him by Alexander himself (for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason) & this was not the least (not the least offence indeed, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote unto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; He answered, That he could not but rejoyce that he was admitted into that sacred Fellowship of the gods, and yet he could not but withall grieve for those that should live under such a one as would exceed the nature of man. This was (saith Alexander) a firm perswasion unto me, that his heart was changed, and that he held my glory in despight. See what a strange Monster Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to be abhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to hear the Kings Oration against him: hee was brought forth in vile garments, and bound like a Theefe; where he heard himself, and his absent Father, the greatest Captain of the World, accused; his two other Brothers, Hegias and Nicanor having been lost in the present Warre. Hee was so greatly oppress with grief, as for a while he could utter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as he sunk under those that led him. In the end, the King asked him, In what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him; which he did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But hereof the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that he disdained the language of his own Country, and so with-drawing himself, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, seeing the King, who had so fully inveighed against him, would not vouchsafe to hear his excuse. For not his enemies only were imboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discovered the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselves, which of them should exceed in hatred towards him. Among many other arguments, which hee used in his own defence, this was not the weakest, That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimnus, what men of mark and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming unwilling to adventure himself with mean and base Companions) Dimnus named unto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Antipater, and some others; but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the party, and have incouraged Nicomachus. Indeed, as Philotas said well for himself, it is likely that Dimnus, thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though he had never dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certain proof, that he knew nothing of their intents that practised against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforced by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him; and it is true, that adversity being seldome able to bear her own burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as she rather desires to draw others (not always deserving it) into the same danger, than to spare any that is can accuse. Yet at the last however it were, to avoid the extremity of restlesse and unnaturall torments, devised by his proffest enemies, Cylotertus, Cenus, Ephestion, and others, Philotas accused his own self, being perswaded that they would have slain him forthwith. But hee failed even in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be laid on flesh and blood, he was forced to deliver, not what he knew, but whatsoever best pleased their ears, that were farre more mercilesse than death it self.

Of this kind of judiciall proceeding S. Augustine greatly complaineth, as a matter to be bewailed, saith he, with Fountains of teares. Quid enim in sua causa quisque torquetur; & cum quæritur utrum sit nocens, cruciatur; & innocens luit pro incerto scelere certissimas pœnas: non quia illud commisisse detegitur, sed quia non commisisse nescitur? What shall not say to it, when one is put to torture in his own cause; and tormented whilest yet it is in question whether he be guilty; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie: not because he is known to have committed the offence, but because others doe not know that he hath not committed it? Aug. de civit. Dei lib. 1. c. 6.

It had been enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had been put to death without torment, the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because he was greatly suspected. But Hemolaus, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in bloud, the greatest motive of his own ill intent. Therefore, Seneca, speaking of Alexander, saith thus; Crudelitas minime humanum malum est, indignum tam miti animo; ferina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abjecto homine in silvestre animal transire; Cruelty is not a humane vice, it is unworthy of so milde a spirit: It is even a beastly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a savage Monster. Sen. de Clem. l. 1

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotas made were to give end to the torments which he could not any longer endure, or that the same was true indeed; For (saith he) in this case, they that speak truly, or they that deny falsly, come to one and the same end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lyncestes, son-in-Law to Antipater, who had been three years in prison, should be slain: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to win the Kings favour, as by loving those whom the King favoured, they were dismist. But Parmenio was yet living; Parmenio, who had served with great fidelity as wel Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himself; Parmenio, that first opened the way into Asia; that had depreſt Attalus the Kings enemy; that had alwayes, and in all hazzards, the leading of the Kings Vant-guard, that was no leſſe prudent in counſell, than fortunate in all attempts, A man beloved of the men of War, and, to ſay the truth, he that had made the purchaſe for the King of the Empire of the Eaſt, and of all the glory and fame he had: That he might not therefore revenge the death of his Son, though not upon the King, (for it was unlikely that he would have diſhonoured his fidelity in his eldeſt age, having now lived threeſcore and ten years) yet upon thoſe that by the witchcraft of flattery had poſſeſt themſelves of his affection, it was reſolved that he ſhould be diſpatcht. Polydamas was employed in this buſineſſe, a man whom of all other Parmenio truſted moſt, and loved beſt, who (to be ſhort) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other murderers with him, ſlew him walking in his Garden, while he was reading the Kings letters. Hic exitus Parmenionis fuit, militiæ domique clari viri, Multa ſine Rege proſperè, Rex ſine illo nihil magnæ rei geſſerat; This was the end of Parmenio (ſaith Curtius) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did never effect any thing worthy of praiſe. Lib. 7.

§. XVIII.

How Alexander ſubdued the Baſtrians, Sogdians, and other people. How Beſſus was delivered into his hands. How he fought with the Scythians.

WHen theſe things had end, Alexander went on with his Army, and brought under his obedience the Arachoſians or Evergitani; he made Menides (ſometime Darius his Secretary) their Governour, then he ſubdued the Arachoſians, and left Menon to command over them. Here the Army, ſometimes led by Parmenio, finds him, conſiſting of twelve thouſand Macedons and Greeks, with whom he paſt through ſome cold Regions with difficulty enough. At length he came to the foot of the Mountain Taurus towards the Eaſt, where he built a City, which he honoured with his own name, and peopled it with ſeven thouſand of his old Macedons, worn with age and with travells of the war. The Arians, who ſince he left them were revolted, he ſubdued again by the induſtrie and valour of Caranus and Erigius. And now he reſolves to find out the new King Beſſus in Bactria. Beſſus, hearing of his comming, prepares to paſſe over the great River of Oxus which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Governor of Bactria abandoned by Beſſus; The Macedonian Army ſuffereth for want of Water, inſomuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, than Alexander had loſt in any one battell againſt the Perſians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after object unto him) hee fought againſt women, not againſt men, and not againſt their perſons, but their ſhadowes. He found on the banks of this great River no manner of Timber or other materials, to make either boats, bridges, or raffe, but was forc'd to ſew together the Hides that covered his carriages, and ſtuffe them with ſtraw, and on them in ſix dayes to paſſe over his Army; which Beſſus might eaſily have diſtreſt, if he had dared but to behold the Macedonian Army afar off. He had formerly complained againſt Darius for neglecting to defend the banks of Tigris, and other paſſages, and yet now, when this traiterous ſlave had ſtyled himſelf a King, he durſt not perform any thing worthy of a ſlave. And therefore thoſe that were neereſt unto him, and whom he moſt truſted, to wit, Spitamenes, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Army, moved both by the care of their own ſafety, and by the memory of Beſſus his Treaſon and cruelty againſt Darius, bound him in the like manner that he had done his Maſter, but with this difference, that he had the chain cloſed about his neck like a maſtiffe Dog, and ſo was dragged along to be preſented to his enemy.

In the mean while Alexander was arrived at a certain Town inhabited with Greeks of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before hee returned out of Greece; whoſe iſſues had well-neer forgotten their Country-language. Theſe moſt cruelly (after they had received him with great joy) he put to the ſword, and deſtroyed their City. At this place he recived Beſſus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the reſt that delivered him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented.

But

But while he now thought himself secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers assaulted his Camp; in repelling whom he received a shot in the leg, the arrow head sticking in the flesh, so as he was carried in a Horse-litter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the foot.

Soon after he came unto Maracanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samarchand, the regall City of the great Tamerlane. It had in compasse threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius saith.) Here he received the Embassadours of the Scythians (called Asiani) who offered to serve him.

The Bactrians are shortly again with the Sogdians stirred to rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the traitor Bessus. Many Cities were resolvedly defended against him, all which, after victory, hee defaced and razed, killing all therein. At one of these he received a blow on the neck, which struck him to the ground, and much disabled him for many dayes after. In the mean while Spitamenes had recovered Maracanda, against whom he employed Menedemus with three thousand foot, and eight hundred horse.

In the heat of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleeve Curtius and others) till he came to the river of Tanais, upon whose bank he built another Alexandria, threescore furlongs in compasse, which he beautified with houses within seventeen dayes after the wals built. The building of this City is said to have bin occasion of a war between him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himself, that this new Town was fortified of purpose to keep him under. I doe not well understand, why the Scythians, offering war in such terrible manner, that Alexander was judged by his own Souldiers to counterfeit sickenesse for very fear, should nevertheless make sute for peace. Neither find I the reason why Alexander (not intending the conquest of those Northern desarts, but onely the defence of his own bank) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further than they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a greater matter; and a victory described, in pursuit of which the Macedonians ran beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus have greatly mistaken this River, which they call Tanais. For it was the River of Jaxartes, that runs between Sogdiana and Scythia, which Alexander past over, while Menedemus was employed in the recovery of Samarchand. But Tanais, which divides Asia from Europe, is neer two thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Scythia, and the way desart and unknown. So that Alexander had (besides Jaxartes) the great River of Volga, and many others to swim over, ere he could recover Tanais; which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Army that followed him, if he had employed all the time that he bestowed Asia in that travell.

Wherefore it is enough to beleeve, that the Asiatique Scythians, making some offer to hinder the erection of his new City, which was like to give some hinderance to their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians, and being naked of defensive armes, easily chased some ten or twelve miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his journey, like enough it is that Bacchus (if in the time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken god) went not very far into that waste Country, where he could find nothing but trees and stones, not other business than to set up a Monument.

Threescore of the Macedonians are said to have bin slain, and one thousand one hundred hurt in this fight, which might easily be in passing a great River, defended against them by good Archers. Of Scythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Camp, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeed it is hardly possible to set down the numbers of such as perish in battell: yet Cæsar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath been so inquisitive into the greatnesse of their own successe, that writers have been able to deliver such particulars by credible report, I hold it not unlawfull to set down what we find; especially when it serves to give light to the businesse in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost, the omission of the number which they slew (a thing not usuall in Curtius, who forbears nothing that may set out the greatnesse of Alexander) and the little booty that was gotten, doe make it probable, that this war was no better than the repulsion of some roving Tartars (the like being yearly performed by the Moscovits, without any any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit, by others.

While Alexander was assuring himself of those Scythians bordering upon Jaxartes, he received the ill newes that Menedemus was slain by Spitamenes, the Army (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slain, to wit, two thousand foot, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appease the rebellion, and to take revenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste he can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander kills, burns, and layes waste all before him, not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Governour in that Province.

To repair this losse he received a great supply of nineteen thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria, with all which, and the old Army, he returns towards the South, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South-side whereof hee built six Towns neer each other for mutuall succour. But he findes a new start-up-Rebell called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirty thousand Souldiers, that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had sought in vain to win by fair words, he made choice of three hundred young men, and promised ten talents to the first, nine to the second, and so in proportion to the rest, that could find a way to creep up to the top thereof. This they performed with the losse of some two and thirty of their men, and then made a sign to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place, who, being shewed by Cophes that the Army of Macedon was already mounted up, yeelded simply to Alexanders mercy, and was (with all his kinred) scourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keep good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seems by the description, might easily have been defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe, Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected: Of which I will give you an example in a place of our own.

The Iland of Sarke, joyning to Garnsey, and of that government, was in Queen Maries time surprised by the French, and could never have been recovered again by force of hand, having cattell and corn enough upon the place to feed so many men as will serve to defend it, and being every way so inaccessible, that it might be held against the Great Turk. Yet by the industry of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this sort regained. He anchored in the road with one Ship of small burden, and pretending the death of his Merchant, besought the French, being some thirty in number, that they might burie their Merchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboord; whereto (with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French-men yeelded. Then did the Fleming put a Coffin into their Boat not filled with a dead carkasse, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebuses. The French received them at their landing, and searching every of them so narrowly as they could not hide a Pen-knife, gave them leave to draw their Coffin up the Rocks with great difficulty; some part of the French took the Flemish Boat, & rowed aboord their Ship to fetch the commodities promised, and what els they pleased, but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the door to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, fell upon the French, they run to the Cliff, and cry to their Company aboord the Fleming to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themselves and the place. Thus a Fox-tail doth sometimes help well to piece out the Lions skin that else would be too short.

XIX.

How Alexander slew his own friends.

AFter these Sogdian and Scythian Wars, we read of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other Frivolous matters, and that he committed the Government of Macedonia, and the Country about it, to Clytus, and how he slew him soon after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the son, or rather because he objected to the King the death of Parmenio, & derided the Oracle of Hammon,

for

for therein he touchd him to the quick, the same being delivered in publike, and at a drunken Banquet. Clytus, indeed, had deserved as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular saved his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himself, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth, Clytus his insolency was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, so the King in his (for neither of them were themselves) forgat whom he went about to slay, for the grief whereof he tare his own face, and sorrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would have slain himself.

Wine begat Furie, Furie matter of Repentance: but preceeding mischiefs are not amended by succeeding bewailing: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; abstantem malis cunctibus verecundiam removet, ubi possedit animum nimia vis vini, quicquid mali latebat, evergit: non facit ebrietas vitia, sed protrahit; Drunkenness both kindles & lays open every vice; it removeth out of the way that shame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastrie, all the ill that before lay hidden breaks out: drunkennesse indeed rather discovers vices, than makes them.

Soon after this, Spitamenes, who slew Bessus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahans also seized upon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and delivered him up. So Alexander being now freed from all these petie-Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he past over, and went on with his Army into Gabaza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storm, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Train. From hence he invaded the Sacans, and destroyed their Country. Thence came he into the Territory of Cohartanes, who submitted himself unto him, feasted him greatly, and presented him with thirty beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxana, afterwards his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst use any freedome of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twenty thousand armed men.

In the mean while he would needs be honoured as a god: whereto that he might allure the Macedonians, he employed two pernicious Parasites, Hagis and Cleo; whom Calisthenes opposed. For, among many other honest arguments used to the assembly, he told Cleo, That he thought, that Alexander would disdain the gift of God-head from his Vassals; That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did sometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it never accompanied any one as yet living in the world. He further told him, That neither Hercules nor Bacchus were Deified at a Banquet, and upon drink (for this matter was propounded by Cleo at a drinking feast), but that, for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and succeeding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behind a partition, and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie to be revenged on Calisthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a lover of the Kings honour, was yet soon after tormented to death; not for that he had betrayed the King to others, but because he never would condescend to betray the King to himself, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracy against the King made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confest) he called Calisthenes without confession, accusation, or triall, to be torn asunder upon the rack: This deed unworthy of a King Seneca thus censureth. Hoc est Alexandri crimen aeternum, quod nulla virtus, nulla bellorum felicitas redimet; Nam quoties quis dixerit, Occidit Persarum multa millia; opponitur Calisthenes, Quoties dictum erit, Occidit Darium, opponitur Calisthenes. Quoties dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus vicit, ipsum quoq; tentavit novis classibus, & Imperium ex angulo Thraciae usq; ad orientis terminos protulit; dicetur, sed Calisthenem occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum Regumque exempla transierit, ex his quae fecit nihil tam magnum erit quam scelus Calisthenis. This is the eternall crime of Alexander, which neither vertue nor felicity of his in War shall ever be able to redeem: For as often as any man shall say, he slew many thousand Persians, it shall be replied, he did so, & he slew Calisthenes; when it shall be said, he slew Darius, it shall be replied, and Calisthenes. When it shall be said, he manned all us far as the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with unusuall Navies, & extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the utmost bounds of the Orient, it shall be said withall, But he killed Calisthenes. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples of Captains and Kings; none of all his acts make so much to his glory, as Curtius thence to his reproach.

§. XX.

Of Alexanders journey into India. The battell between him and Porus.

With the Army before remembred, of one hundred and twenty thousand foot and horse, Alexander did enter the borders of India, where such of the Princes, as submitted themselves unto him, he entertained lovingly, the rest he constrained, killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they resisted. He then came before Nisa built by Bacchus, which after a few dayes was rendred unto him. From thence he removed to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens, filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feasts for ten dayes together. Now when he had drunk his fill, hee went on towards Dedala, and from thence to Arados. Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victuals failing, he divides his Army: Ptolomy led one part, Cenon another, and himself the rest. They take many Towns, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men, but after some resistance, it was yeelded unto him by Cleophe the Queen, to whom again he restored it, at the siege of this City he received a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Polysparchon, and a Rock of great strength by himself: he wanne also a passage upon one Eryx, who was slain by his company, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those pares, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Ephestion, who (being sent before) had prepared boats for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arrivall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country, to submit himself to this great Conqueror. Therefore, soon upon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himself with all the strength of his Country, and six and fifty Elephants, unto him, offering him his service and assistance. He made Alexander know, that he was an Enemy to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abisares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this dissension to make his own victory by far the more easie. He presented Alexander with a Crown of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withall fourscore talents of silver coyn; which Alexander not only refused, but to shew that he was covetous of glory, not of gold, he gave Omphis a thousand talents of his own treasure, besides other Persian rarities. Abisares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemy Omphis into his protection, resolved to make his own peace also: For, knowing that his own strength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference between them, than that which the chance of Warre gave, hee thought it an unmeet matter, when Alexander, who had already beaten under foot all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himself a Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander now no more to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he sent a commandement, that hee should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus he received this manly answer; That he would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement he was resolved to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolves to passe over the River Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his own home. Porus attends him on the farther bank with thirty thousand foot, fourscore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troop of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had surely staied somwhat longer ere he had seen India. The River was foure furlonges broad, which makes half a mile, and withall deep and swift. It had in it many Ilands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacity. Alexander sent Ptolomy up the River with a great part of the Army, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this device being drawn from his first incamping, sets himself down opposite to Ptolomy, supposing that the whole Army of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the mean while Alexander recovers the further shore without resistance. He orders his troops, and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather believes, that Abisares his Confederate (but now the Conclusion of fortune) had bin come over Hydaspes to his aid, than that Alexander had past it.

But

that he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with four thousand horse, and a hundred armed Waggons to entertain him. Each Waggon had in it four to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little use: for there had fallen so much rain, and thereby the fields were so moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians and Dahans had the Vant-guard, who so galled these Indiani, as they brake their rains, and other furniture, overturning the Waggons, and those in them. Perdiccas also gave up the Indian horse-men, and the one and the other were forc'd to recoile. Porus moves forward with grosse of his Army, that those of his Vant guard scattered might recover his Rear; Alexander being followed with Ephestion, Ptolomy, and Perdiccas took on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Canon to invade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, he directed to break upon Porus his battell of foot, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himself being carried upon one of them, of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters, being well guarded with the long and strong pikes of the Macedonians, so galled them, as being inraged, they turned head, and ran over the foot that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the advantage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulnesse of the Macedonian Captains, the victory fell to Alexander, who also far exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Eastern and Northern Nations, Porus was assailed by his own Confederate and Countrie people. Yet for his own person he never gave ground otherwise than with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his Army, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom again he received his estate with a great enlargement.

§. XXI.

How Alexander finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

I forbear to trouble my self and others with a frivolous discourse of Serpents, Apes, and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their travels: or of those petties Warres which Alexander made between the overthrow of Porus, and his sailing down the River of Indus. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better known unto us in this Age, by means of our late Navigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of those Kings we could in no sort be perswaded to believe, till our own experience had taught us, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to be seen between London and Staines.

Our great traveller Mandevile, who died in the year 1372, and had seen so much of the World, and of the East India, we accompted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Covent of the Friers Guillimins in Liege, where the religious of that place keep some things of his, Comme pour honourable memoire de son Excellence, For an honourable memorie of his Excellencie, saith Guichardine. Guic. in Disc. of the Low Countries.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradrus, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the main stream, are now possest by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlain, who commands all the tract between Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a Ship of London, suffered shipwrack, in the year 1609. and some of the company travelled over Land till they came to Agra; the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Diospolis.

Philostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells us, that those two great Captains (whom Alexander sought by all means to our-fame) when they endevoured to subject to them the Oxidracæ, a people inhabiting between the Rivers of Hyphasis and Ganges, they were beaten from the assault of their Cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be understood by the great Ordnance that those people had then in use: For it is now certainly known, that the great Kings of the uttermost East, have had the use of the canon many hundreds of years since, and even since their first civilitie and greatnesse, which was long before

Alexanders

Alexander's time. But Alexander pierc'd not so far into the East. It sufficed, that having already over-wearied his Army, he discovered the rest of India by fame. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued, informed him, that a Prince called Aggrames, who commanded many Nations beyond the River Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions: and that he was able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twenty thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed than ever to proceed in this discovery and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wander over those great Desarts beyond Indus & Ganges, more terrible unto them than the greatest Army that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswasive Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discover such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, devised a pretty tricke, wherewith he hoped to beguile posterity, and make himself seem greater than he was. He enlarged his Camp, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for Souldiers, greater Horse-stalls, and higher mangers than Horses could feed in. He caused all furniture of men and horses to be made larger than would serve for use; and scattered these Armours and Bridles about his Camp, to be kept as reliques, and wondred at by the Savages. Proportionable to these he raised up twelve great Altars to be the monument of his journies end. This was a ready way to encrease the fame of his bigenesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing save a suspition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he strove so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned again to the bank of Acesines, and there determined to set up his fleet, where Acesines and Hydaspes incounter; where to testifie by a surer monument, how far he had past towards the East, he built by those rivers two Cities: the one he called Nicæa, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloved Horse Bucephalus. Here again he received a fourth supply of six thousand Thracian Horse-men, seven thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon five and twenty thousand Armours, garnished with silver and gold, which he distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wan many Towns, and committed great slaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he leapt from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Bevis of Southampton, frivolous and incredible. Finally, he past down the River with his fleet, at which time also the newes came unto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embassadours from a King of India, who submitted himself unto him. He feasted these Embassadours upon a hundred beds of gold, with all the sumptuosity that could be devised, who soon after their dispatch, returned again with a present of three hundred Horses, one hundred and thirty Waggons, and to each of them four Horses, a Thousand Targets, with many other things rare and rich.

Their entertainments ended, he sailed towards the South, passed through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld unto him either quietly, or compelled by force: among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Sabus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned swords, with one of which Ptolomy (afterward King of Egypt) was wounded, and cured by an herb which Alexander dreampt he had seen in the mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neer the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies, as they were on a sudden shuffled one upon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drie ground, and on the sandie banks of the River, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed; but after he had a few daies observed well the course of the Sea, he past out of the rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune, returned: and the better to inform himself, he sent Nearchus and Onesicritus, to discover the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his sixt Book hath written this passage down the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels in which he transported his Army, the Commanders that were used therein, and other the marvellous provisions made.

Neer the out-lets of this River, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteen daies march from thence recovered Gedrosia, in which passage his Army suffered such misene for want of food, that of a hundred and twenty thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part returned alive.

§. XXII.

of Alexander's Riot, Cruelty, and death.

FRom Gedrosia, Alexander led his Army into Carmania, and so drawing neer to Persia, he gave himself wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice be hatefull enough in it self, yet it alwayes inflamed this King to Cruelty. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for Alexander, one of his Provinciall Governors, he commanded to be slain, so as neither did the excesse of voluptuousnesse qualifie his cruelty, nor his cruelty hinder in ought his voluptuousnesse.

While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foot and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellows, that had bin employed in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was made by the Deputies of the Provinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were so outragious, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his return out of India, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembring the vertue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chief, with six hundred Souldiers by them employed, were delivered over to the Hang-man: every one rejoycing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Iland rich in gold, and of other strange things; whereupon they were commanded to make some farther discoverie: which done, that they should enter the mouth of Euphrates, and find the King at Babylon.

As he drew neer to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now called Chalpetes, where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Bagoas, an Eunuch in speciall favour with the King, was neglected, he not only practised certain loose fellowes to witnesse against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus tombe, for which fact he was condemned to die; but he stabbed the Hang-man with his own hands in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradates to be slain, suspecting his greatnesse. Caperat (saith Curtius) esse animum ad reprehensanda supplicia, sicuti ad deterior a credenda; He began head-longly to find fault, and to believe false reports. It is true, that he took a way to make all men weary of his government, seeing cruelty is more fearfull, than all adventures that can be made against it.

Arrianus hath a far different description of Cyrus tombe.

At this time it is said, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himself, when he had lived threescore and thirteen years. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrie, being an Indian, or sought to prevent the grief and incommoditie of elder age, is is uncertain: but in this the Historians agree, that fore-seeing and fore-shewing Alexanders death, he promised to meet him shortly after at Babylon.

From Pasargada he came to Susa, where he maried Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giving her younger sister to his beloved Ephestion, and fourscore other Persian Ladies to his Captains. There were six thousand guests invited to the feast, to each of which he gave a cup of gold. Here there came unto him three thousand young souldiers, out of his conquered Provinces, whereat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, having lavishly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him gone with five thousand Talents, and six thousand hired Souldiers; but he was refused in Greece, and there slain. Alexander greatly rejoyced at the fidelity of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stir: yet he sent commandement that they should again receive their banished men, whereunto (fearfull of his indignation) all submitted themselves (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a marvellous discontentment in his Army, because he had resolved to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers, which could no longer endure the travell of Warre, and to keep the rest in Asia. He used many Orations to satisfie them, but it was in vain during the tempest tempeſt of their fury. But afterward, as Whales are drawn to the Land with a twine-threed, when they have troubled a while, ſo are the unconſiderate multitude eaſily conducted when their firſt paſſions are evaporate. With ſuch as were licenced to depart, he ſent Craterus, to whom he gave the Lieutenantſhip of Macedon, Theſſaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his firſt departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his abſence, diſcharged the truſt committed unto him with great fidelity, and ſent him ſo many ſtrong ſupplies into Aſia from time to time. Certainly if Alexander had not taken counſell of his cups, he would have caſt ſome better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a ſtronger reaſon for his remove, than to have employed him in the conduction of a new ſupply to be brought him to Babylon, the Warre being now at an end. For Antipater ſaw nothing in this remove, but the Kings diſpoſition to ſend him after Parmenio, and the reſt. With this Antipater, the King, notwithſtanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though jealous, doe not ſtand in doubt of every man ill affected, though valiant: but there is a kind of kingly courage, compounded of hardineſſe and underſtanding, which is many times ſo fearfull unto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themſelves thereof.

After he had ſent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to ſettle things there; where Epheſtion, whom he favoured moſt of all men, dies. The King according to the greatneſſe of his love, laments his loſſe, hangs his Phyſician, and beſtowes upon his Monument twelve thouſand talents: After which he returns to Babylon. Thither Antipater came not, but ſent; and not to excuſe himſelf, but to free himſelf. For if we believe Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gain-ſay) Antipater by his ſons, Caſſander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gave him poyſon; Theſſalus (who was of the conſpiracie) having invited him to a drinking feaſt of purpoſe. For after he had taken a carouſe in Hercules his cup, a draught of drink ſtronger than Hercules himſelf, he quited the World within a few daies.

Certainly the Princes of the World have ſeldome found good, by making their Miniſters over-great, and therby ſuſpicious to themſelves. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelity to be a debt, but is perſwaded, that Kings ought to purchaſe it from their Vaſſals, will never pleaſe himſelf with the price given. The only reſtorative, indeed, that ſtrengthens it, is the goodneſs and vertue of the Prince, & his liberality makes it more diligent, ſo as proportion and diſtance be obſerved. It may be that Antipater, having commanded two or three Kingdomes ten or twelve years, knew not how to play any other part, no more than Cæſar did, after he had ſo long a time governed the Gaules, where he utterly forgot the art of obedience. A moſt cruell and ungratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius do not belie him: For though he feared ſome ill meaſure upon his remove (the Tragedies of Parmenio, Clytus, and Calliſthenes, having bin ſo lately acted) yet he knew nothing to the contrary, but that the King had reſolved to have given him ſome other great government in Aſia: The old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance deſired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

§. XXIII.

Of Alexanders perſon and qualities.

HOwſoever it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot be excuſed, no more than his vanitie to be eſteemed the ſon of Jupiter, with his exceſſive delight in drink and drunkenneſſe, which others make the cauſe of his fever and death. In that he lamented his want of enterpriſing, and grieved to conſider what he ſhould doe when he had conquered the World, Auguſtus Cæſar found juſt cauſe to deride him, as if the well-governing of ſo many Nations and Kingdoms, as he had already conquered, could not have offered him matter more than aboundant, to buſie his brains withall. That he was both learned and a lover of learning, it cannot be doubted. Sir Francis Bacon, in his firſt book of the Advancement of Learning, hath proved it ſufficiently. His liberality I know not how to praiſe, becauſe it exceeded proportion. It is ſaid, That when he gave a whole Citie to one of his ſervants, He, to whom it was given, did out of modeſty refuſe it, as diſproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replied, That he did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: of which Seneca

animosa vox videtur & regia, cum sit stultissima. Nihil enim per se quenquam decet. Refert quid, cui, quando, quare, ubi, &c. sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; habeatur personarum & dignitatum proportio, & cum sit ubiq; virtutis modus, aquè peccat quod excedit, quàm quod deficit; It seemes a brave and Royall speech, whereas indeed it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it self beseems a man. We must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations no act can be approved. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas vertue is ever limited by measure, the excesse is as faulty as the defect. L. 2. de Ben. c. 1

For his Person, it is very apparent, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it self, not much to be admired; For I am resolved that he had ten thousand in his Army as daring as himself. Surely, if adventurous natures were to be commended simply, we should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Theeves, Ruffians, and mastiff Dogs. For certainly it is no way praise-worthy but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in which we are employed for the service of our Kings and Common-weales.

If we compare this great Conquerour with other troublers of the world, who have bought their glory with so great destruction and effusion of bloud, I think him far inferiour to Cæsar, & many other that lived after him, seeing he never undertook any warlike Nation, the naked Scythians excepted; nor was ever encounted with any Army of which he had not a most mastering advantage, both of Weapons & Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captains by far exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seems Fortune and Destinie (if we may use those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his own, both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdomes that invited and called in their own Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Son, gives this judgement of them: Quod non minores fuere pestes mortalium, quàm inundatio, quæ planum omne perfusum est, quàm conflagratio, qua magna pars animantium exaruit; They were no lesse plagues to mankind, than an overflow of waters, drowning all the level; or some burning drought, whereby a great part of living creatures are scorched up. Nat. quæst. l. 3. c. 1.

Chap. III.

The reign of Aridæus.

§. I.

Of the question about succession to Alexander.

THE death of Alexander left his Army (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, having lost his only eye. For that which is reported in fables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance uneffectuall, and harmfull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the divine ordinance) where partly the uncertainty of Title to succession in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the stubborn pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to be his heir, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his own fortune; but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals, a lesson soon taught unto spirits reflecting upon their own worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly been shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) governing in Macedon as Protector, assumed unto himself the Kingdome, not rendring it unto Amyntas, (the Son of his elder brother Perdiccas) when he grew to mans estate; but only bestowing upon him in marriage a Daughter of his own: by which bond, and much more by his own proper strength, hee assured the Crown unto himself: Amyntas never attempting ought against Philip, though (with price of his life) he did against againſt Alexander in the beginning of his reign. Wherefore Eurydice, the ſole iſſue of this marriage, ought in reaſon to have been acknowledged Queen after Alexander; as having better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, unleſſe (peradventure) ſome Law of that Nation forbad the reign of Women. But the excellent vertue of theſe two Princes had utterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their own bodies: and ſo great were their conqueſts, that Macedon it ſelf was (in regard of them) a very ſmall Appendix, and no way deſerving to be laid in ballance againſt the demand of their poſterity, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall ſeat.

Alexander having taken many wives, had iſſue by none of the principall of them. Barſine the Daughter of Artabazus a Perſian, had born unto him a young Son: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more ſolemnly married) was left by him great with child. But the baſeneſſe of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleged in Barre of Plea made for them, by ſome that would (perhaps) have wrought out their own ends, under the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra a ſiſter of Alexander, widow to the King of Epirus, and Aridæus his baſe brother (ſon to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Lady Eurydice before mentioned, were next in courſe. Of Cleopatra there was no ſpeech, which may give ſuſpition, that either Law or Cuſtome had made that ſex uncapable of the Soveraignty: Aridæus (beſides his baſtardy) was neither for perſon nor quality fit to rule as King; yet upon him the election fell, but ſlowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counſellors having over-laboured their diſagreeing wits in deviſing what was beſt, were content for very wearineſſe to take what comes next to hand.

Ptolomy (ſoon after King of Egypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the half-Perſian brood, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all ſhould be given to the Captains; that going for law which by the greater part of them ſhould be decreed: ſo farre was he from acknowledging any one as true Heir to the Crown.

This Ptolomy was called the ſonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having uſed the company of Arſinoë Ptolomie's mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus, being great with child. Therefore, whether it were ſo that he hoped well to work his own fortune out of thoſe diſſentions, which are incident unto the conſultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeem their quiet with ſubjection to one, deſerving regard by his bloud, and truſt for his even carriage; or whether he deſired only to get a ſhare to himſelf, which could not have come to paſſe, had all been given to one: plain enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridæus before himſelf; and therefore gave ſuch counſell as fitted his own and other mens purpoſes. Yea, this device of his took place indeed, though not in form as he had propounded it; For, it was in effect all one, to have aſſembled at Alexanders empty chair, as Ptolomy had conceived the form of their conſultations, or to ſet in the chair ſuch a King as Aridæus, no wiſer than the chair it ſelf. Alſo the controverſies ariſing were determined by the greater part of the Captains; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puiſſance.

But as theſe counterfeit ſhewes of diſſembling aſpirers doe often take check by the plain-dealing of them who dare to go more directly to work: ſo was it like to have fared with Ptolomy and the reſt, when Ariſtonus another of the Captains, interpreted the very words of Alexander, ſaying, That he left his Kingdom to the worthieſt, as deſigning Perdiccus, to whom (lying at the point of death) he delivered his ring. It ſeemed good in reaſon, that Alexander ſhould be diſpoſer of his own purchaſes: and thoſe tokens of Alexanders purpoſe appeared plain enough, ſo long as no man would interpoſe anothers conſtruction: every one being uncertain how the ſecret affections of the reſt might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or becauſe they would not be of the lateſt, urged Perdiccus to take upon him the eſtate Royall. He was no ſtranger to the Royall bloud; yet his birth gave him not ſuch reputation, as the great favour of his dead King, with whom he had bin very inward, & that eſpecially ſince the death of Epheſtion (a powerful Minion) into whoſe place he was choſen. For his own worth he might wel be commended, as a good man of War, and one that had given much proof of his private valour. But very ſurly he was: which quality (joyned with good fortune) carried a ſhew of

Majeſty:

Majesty: being checkt with misadventure, it was called by a true name, Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesse a foolish over-weening did him as great harm, as it had been great happinesse to have succeeded Alexander. For, not content to have the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Aristonus, he would needs counterfeit modesty; thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the weighty burden of an Empire, which would be the lesse envious, the more solemnity he used in the acceptance. It is truly said, He that feigneth himself a Sheep, may chance to be eaten by a Wolf. Meleager, (a man by nature envious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiccas) took advantage of his irresolute behaviour, and very bitterly enveighed against him. In conclusion, hee pronounced, That whosoever was Heir to the Crown, the Souldiers ought to be Heirs to the Treasure, and therefore he invited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captains were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without consent of the Souldiers, who greedy of spoyl, thronged about Meleager.

§. II.

The Election of Aridæus, with the troubles there-about arising; the first division of the Empire.

During this up-roar, mention was made of Aridæus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, untill at last it grew to the voyce of the Army. Meleager having withdrawn himself tumultuously from the company of the Lords, was glad of so fair an occasion to make himself great: therefore hee produced Aridæus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and brought him into the Palace, invesling him in Alexander's robes, and proclaiming him King. Many of the Nobles withstood this election, but in vain: for they could not resolve what course to follow, rejecting this. Only Python, a hot-headed man, took upon him to protect him the Son of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsell which Perdiccas at first had given, appointing Perdiccas and Leonatus his Protectors. But the child was not yet born, which made that attempt of Python vain. Finally, Perdiccas with six hundred men, and Peuleus with the Kings Pages, took upon them to defend the place where Alexanders body lay: but the Army conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in upon them, and inforced them to accept Aridæus for their Soveraign Lord. Then by the intercession of the ancient Captains, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of Royall blood, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horse, which consisted (for the most part) of the Nobility. Perdiccas abode in the City (but standing upon his guard) that he might be ready to take the opportunity of any commotion that should happen among the infantry. The King (who was governed by Meleager) commanded, or gave leave to have Perdiccas made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither secretly carried, nor committed to fit executioners. Their coming was not unexpected; and they were by Perdiccas stricken with such gravity, that they departed homeward then they came, heavy for their bad successe. Upon the newes of this attempt, the Camp was in a tumult, which the King seeking to pacifie, wanted authority, as having newly got the Crown by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it self afforded no good excuses; and his indiscretion made the matter worse. Hee said that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was alive: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which he imputed to Meleager; abandoning the succes of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, untill the King by offering to resign his estate unto them, renewed out of their pity that favourable affection, which had moved them to set him up at the first.

Perdiccas having now joyned himself with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all provision of victuals from the Citie. But after sundry Embassies passing between the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of sedition given up into their hands; the King, that Meleager might be joyned with Leonatus and Perdiccas, as a Third in government of the Army) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should have done well to consider, That such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered, had not some purpose of treachery lurked under their great facility. Generall peace was renewed, and much love protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had been in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windy spirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiccas, tending to his own disgrace, but in such termes as might seem to have proceeded from Meleager: who finding part of the drift, but not all, took it as an injury done to himself; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiccas, that such authors of discord might be punished. Perdiccas (as a lover of peace) did well approve the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should be made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Army. The plot was mischievously layd. Had Meleager given way to seditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the general hatred of all, as a sower of dissention, & thereby with a publike approbation might have bin cut off, as having often offended in that kind: his Prince being too weak a Patron. Now seeking redresse of these disorders, he hastened his own ruine, by a lesse formall, but more speedy way. This kind of Muster was very solemn, and practised with many ceremonies, as for cleansing of the Army. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercenaries were each according to their quality set in array, apart from others, as if they had bin of sundry sorts, met at adventure: which done, the manner was to skirmish (as by way of exercise) according to the direction of their severall Captains. But at that time the great battell of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disadvantage; and the countenance of the Horse and Elephants beginning to give charge upon them, was such, as discovered no jesting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwayes wont to fight among the horse-men: of which custome Perdiccas made great use that day, to the utter confusion of his enemies. For Aridæus was alwaies governed by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three dayes before, he sought the death of Perdiccas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas up and down about the foot-men, commanding them to deliver unto the death all such as Perdiccas required. Three hundred they were who were cast unto the Elephants, and by them slain, in the presence of the King (who should have defended them) and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he disturbed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Having therefore kept himself quiet a while, as unwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage, when he saw their proceedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a temple, which he found no Sanctuary: for thither they sent and slew him.

The Army being thus corrected, was led into the City, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves, leaving to Aridæus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiccas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought upon; whose body having bin seven dayes neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Egyptians: no sign of poyson appearing, how great soever the suspicion might be. The charge of his buriall was committed to Aridæus: one of the Captains, who was two years preparing of a great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarses of his friends being layd in the ground before that of Alexander was bestowed in Alexandria, a City of his own building, in Egypt.

§. III.

The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

WHileſt theſe things were in doing, or preſently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the reſt, were buſied in Greece with a war, which the Athenians more bravely than wiſely had begun in Alexanders life, but now did proſecute more boldly than before, upon the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander not long before he died, had commanded that all the baniſhed Greeks (few excepted) ſhould be reſtored unto their former places. He knew the factious quality of the Grecian Eſtates, & therfore thought ſo to provide, that in every City he would have a ſure party. But it fell out otherwiſe: For he loſt the hearts of many more than he won by this proud injunction. His pleaſure indeed was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being againſt all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyranny. The Athenians greatly decayed in eſtate, but retaining more than was needfull of their ancient ſpirits, forbad the execution of this decree in their Dominions; ſo did alſo the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature: yet neither of them took Armes, but ſeemed to bear themſelves, as men that had done no more than they might well juſtifie by reaſon: nevertheleſſe to prevent the worſt, the Athenians gave ſecret inſtructions to Leoſthenes, a Captain of theirs, willing him to levie an Army, but in his own name, and to keep it in a readineſſe for their uſe. This was no hard thing for Leoſthenes to doe: great numbers of Greek Souldiers being lately returned from the Aſian War in poor eſtate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of theſe he had gathered up eight thouſand, when the certain newes were brought of Alexanders death: at which the City of Athens declared it ſelf, and more honourably than wiſely, proclamed open War againſt the Macedonians for the liberty of Greece. Hereupon Leoſthenes drew-in the Ætolians and ſome other Eſtates, gave battell to the Bœotians, who ſided with Antipater, and overthrew them; growing ſo faſt in reputation, and ſo ſtrong in adherents, that Antipater (arming in all haſte, yet ſuſpecting his own ſtrength) was fain to ſend into Aſia to Craterus for ſuccour.

Nothing is more vain than the feares and hopes of men, ſhunning or purſuing their deſtinies a farre off, which deceive all mortall wiſdome, even when they ſeem near at hand. One moneth was ſcarcely paſt, ſince nothing ſo heavily burthened the thoughts of Antipater as the return of Craterus into Macedon; which he then feared as death, but now deſired as the moſt likely aſſurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the moſt aſſured unto him, was ſent into Macedon to convey home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) & to ſucceed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The ſuſpitions were ſtrong that he had a privie charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly publiſhed ſound much better; which was, That Antipater ſhould be ſent unto the King, as Captain of the young Souldiers, newly to be levied in Europe. For Alexander was much incenſed againſt him by his Mother Olympias: and would ſometimes give out ſpeeches, teſtifying his own jealouſie and hatred of him; but yet he ſtrove to ſmother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had eſcaped with life: moſt of them indeed were mean perſons in regard of thoſe who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was ſuch, as could find rebellious purpoſes (for ſo hee interpreted even lewd government) in baſe perſons; little might Antipater hope for, who having ſitten Vice-roy ten yeares in the ſtrongeſt part of the Empire, was called away to the preſence of ſo fell a Maſter, and the envie of a Court, wherein they had been his inferiours, which would now repine to ſee him their equall. Therefore whether his fear drew him to prevention, working firſt the Kings death by poyſon, given by his ſon Iolaus, Alexanders Cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth untill opportunity had changed it into the paſſion of revenge, which was cruelly performed by his ſon Caſſander: great cauſe of much fear he had; which I note in this place, as the ground of effects to be produced in very few years.

At the preſent Craterus was ſent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying near, ſolicited ſolicited to make haſte. Not without cauſe: For in Macedon there could not at that time be raiſed more than thirteen thouſand foot, and ſix hundred horſe; which Muſter was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Country being emptyed into Aſia. The Theſſalians indeed who had long ſtood firm for Philip & Alexander, who alſo were the beſt horſemen of Greece, furniſhed him with very brave troups, that might have done great ſervice, had their faith held out, which they changed for the liberty of Greece. With theſe forces did Antipater in Theſſaly try the fortune of a battell with Leoſthenes; rather (as may ſeem) fearing the increaſe of his enemies power, and rebellion of the Greeks, (were they not checkt at the firſt) than preſuming on his ſtrength. For Leoſthenes had of Athenians, Ætolians, and Mercenaries, two and twenty thouſand foot, beſides the aſſiſtance of many petty Signories, and of ſome Illyrians and Thracians: of horſe he brought into the field about two thouſand and five hundred; but over-ſtrong he was that way alſo, when once the Theſſalians had revolted unto him. So Antipater loſt the day; and his loſſe was ſuch, that he neither was able to keep the field, nor to make a ſafe retrait into his own Country: therefore he fled into the Town of Lamia, which was well fortified, and well provided of all things neceſſary to bear out a ſiege. Thither did Leoſthenes follow him, preſent him battell again, and upon refuſall cloſe up the Town with earth-works, and a wall. There will we leave him for a while, travelling in the laſt honourable enterpriſe that ever was undertaken by that great City of Athens.

§. IV.

How Perdiccas employed his Army.

KIng Aridæus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his own Province, kept a naked Court: all his greatneſſe conſiſting in a bare title, ſupported by the ſtrength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwiſe than to make uſe of him. Perdiccas had no Province of his own peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he ſhould viſit in his government. A ſtronger Army that any of the reſt he had, which he might eaſily hope in that unſetled condition of things to make better worth to him than many Provinces could have bin. The better to accompliſh his deſires, he cloſely ſought the marriage of Cleopatra, the ſiſter of Alexander; yet about the ſame time he either married Nicæa the daughter of Antipater, or made ſuch love to her as blinded their eyes, who did not ſomewhat narrowly ſearch into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the ſecond of that name, and tenth king of that Country, had continued faithfull to the Perſian Empire as long as it ſtood: following the example of his forefathers, even from Pharnaces the firſt that reigned in Cappadocia, who married Atoſſa ſiſter to the great Cyrus. Some of his Anceſtors had (indeed) been oppreſſed by the Perſian: but what Fortune took from them at one time, Vertue reſtored at another, and their faithfull Princes had much encreaſed all. But now in the fatall Period of ſo great an Empire, with much wiſdome, and (Darius being ſlain) with ſufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perſians room. This he did not; neither did Alexander call him to account, being occupied with great cares. But Perdiccas, who had no greater buſineſs wherein to entertain his Army, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take that in-land Kingdome, ſurrounded with Provinces of the Macedonian conqueſt, and for his own particular, to have one opportune place of ſure retrait, under the government of a ſtedfaſt friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirty thouſand foot, and fifteen thouſand horſe (a ſtrong Army, had it not encountred a ſtronger, and better trained) wan the victory, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much cruelty did he uſe the victory: for having taken Ariarathes priſoner, with many others, he crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light upon; and ſo delivered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he truſted moſt.

Another part of his forces he had cõmitted to Python, rather as to the moſt honourable of ſuch as remained about him, than as to the moſt aſſured. Python was to ſubdue the Greeks rebelling in the high Countries of Aſia. About twenty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe they were, (all old Souldiers) who, planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous nations, were ſoon weary of their unpleaſant habitatiõs, & the rude people people, among whom they lived: and therefore took advantage of the present troubles to seek unto themselves a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his own, than to destroy them: which intent of his, Perdiccas discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giving the spoyles of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyned it unto Pythons Captaines (his own creatures) that they should see this commandement executed. These directions for use of the victory, might have proved needlesse; so uncertain was the victory it self. A Captain of the Rebels commanding over three thousand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessity to a hill not farre off, This dismaied the rest, and gave the day to Python: who being far enough from Perdiccas, offered composition to the vanquished, granting unto them their lives and liberty, under condition of laying down their armes; and hereupon he gave them his faith. Being master of these Companies, he might well have a good opinion of his own power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himself as free Lord of any Territory. He had thirteen thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needlesse fear without great losse had caused to leave the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse whereof Python might think himself assured, was (and soon appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, levied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdiccas, by which they were enjoyned to give assistance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept given unto them by Perdiccas, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poor men who had yeelded themselves; leaving Python as naked as he came forth to return unto his great Master.

Now was Perdiccas mighty above the mighty, and had fair leasure to pursue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himself Lord of all: but this must be secretly carryed for fear of opposition. How it succeeded, will appear when the Lamian War taketh ending.

§ V.

The processe of the Lamian War.

WEe left Antipater hardly besieged, wanting means to free himself without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so soon as he expected, he came to parley with Leosthenes, and would have yeelded unto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victory, do seldome limit their desires. Leosthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himself to discretion. This was too much for him that had once commanded over them, who now required of him such a dishonourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremitie, from which as yet he was farre enough, could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Town, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring War the Ætolians (whether weary of sitting still at a siege, or having busines which they pretended at home) took their leave, and returned into their own Countrey. Their departure left the trenches so thinly manned, that Antipater found meanes to sally out upon his enmies to their great losse: for many were slain, and Leosthenes himself among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Town. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieved, their victuals wasted, and they were not strong enough to deal with the Greeks in open fight. Craterus was long in comming. Lysimachus, who was neerest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own, leading no more than four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, against Seuthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field above foure times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without losse had gotten one victory, yet the enemy abounding in multitude, felt not the blow so much as might abate his courage. Therefore Leonatus was earnestly solicited by Antipaters friends, to make all haste to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygia the lesse, and was able to raise an Army of more than twenty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, whether levied out of his province, or appointed unto him out of the main Army, it is uncertain. Certain it is, that he was more willing ling to take in hand the journey into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. For Cleopatra had written unto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chief Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her self to be his wife; which letters he kept not so close as had bin requisite, and therefore brought himself into great suspition, that soon ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approach, forsook the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an evill welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyn in one. He had (notwithstanding the departure of the Ætolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Thessalians; in other things he was equall with him; in cause he thought himself Superiour; in the fortune of that day he proved so: for he wan a great victory (chiefly by vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himself; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marish piece of ground, where he found his death, which he desperatly had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far from the place of his nativity. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which dyed in battell, but all, or most of the rest shall follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did never any thing suitable to their ancient glory.

The vanquished Macedonians were too weak to renew the fight, and too proud to flie. They betook themselves to high grounds, unfit for service on horse-back, and so abode in the sight of the enemy that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their Camp, and took the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemy should increase, did earnestly seek to determine the matter quickly by another battell. But still Antipater kept himself on ground of advantage; which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greeks, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemy to be vanquished. This wretchlesness (incorrigible in an Army of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were very much defaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians, labouring to have made themselves once again Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captivity of Greece came on, of which she never could be delivered unto this day. Craterus with a strong Army having made great marches from Cilicia, passed over into Europe, and comming into Thessaly, joyned himself with Antipater. The forces of Leonatus, Antipater, and Craterus being joyned in one, contained forty thousand weightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greeks wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse; in foot, eighteen thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus labour to avoyd the necessity of a battell, untill such time as the Towns confederate should return unto the Camp those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in comming, and Antipater so urgent upon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazzard without further attendance. Like enough it is, that with a little more help they had carried away the victory: for the Thessalians had the upper hand, and held it, untill such time as they perceived their battels (over-laid with multitude) retire unto the higher ground, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of an hundred & thirty men, they had only purchased the death of some five hundred enemies. Yet hereof was great use made: For the Greeks, as not subject unto the full command of one General, and being every one desirous to preserve his own estate and City, concluded to make a treaty of peace with Antipater; who being a subtle Artificer, and well understanding their aptnesse to division, refused to hearken to any generall composition, but willed every City to deal apart for it self. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was rejected; the Greeks chooseing rather to abide the comming of their assistants, whose unreasonable careleshesse betrayed the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging and winning some Towns in Thessaly, which the Army of the Confederates wanted means and courage to relieve, wearied that Nation from attending any longer upon other mens unlikely hopes, with their own assured and present calamity.

of the peace granted to Athens by Antipater. of Demosthenes his death.

THe Thessalians falling off, all the rest soon followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting such as were slack. Only the Athenians and Aetolians held out. Little favour could they hope for, having been Authors of this tumult: and their fear was not great; the seat of the war being far from them. But the celerity of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who sate still at Athens, devising upon courses of prosecuting the War to come, which came to their dores before their consultation could find issue. He was ready to enter upon their Frontiers; they had no ability to resist, and were as heartlesse as friendlesse. All that remained was to send Embassadours, desiring peace upon some good termes: necessity enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Phocion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chief of this Embassage; Phocion, as the most honourable; Demades, a strong perswader (both of them well respected by Antipater); and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisdome, gravity of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost them much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to mind the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, hee commanded them to defray the charges of the War past, to pay a fine, and entertain a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the government of the City to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a competent proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the administration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retain the name and form of a Democratie. But the rascall multitude of beggarly persons, accustomed to gather their livings out of the common troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voyces, cryed out, that this was a meer Oligarchie, the violent usurpation of a few incroaching upon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had been wont to say, That war to them was peace, and peace war) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gave them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his own suspitions and hatred) he caused Demosthenes and Hyperides, famous Orators, with some others, to be slain. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, been forborn, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have passed for very milde: whereas now, all such as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosthenes, or have surrendred their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that ever did speak and write, condemn him utterly, calling him a bloudy tyrant. Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts find in all civill Nations, that the evill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good soever otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calauria; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) find him, and gently perswaded him to leave the place; but not so prevailing, he threatned violence. Then Demosthenes entreating a little respite, as it had been to write somewhat, secretly took poison, which he had kept for such a necessitie, and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution upon himself, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable perhaps in a Heathen man) argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in battell, howsoever valiant in perswading to enterprises, wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. He loved money well, and had great summes given him by the Persian, to encourage him, in finding work for the Macedonians at home. Neither did he ill (me thinks) in taking from the Persians which loved not his Countrey, great rewards, for speaking such things as tended to his Countreys good; which he did not ceaſe to procure, when the Perſians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can endure no honourable, though true, mention of Antipater, may (if they can) beleeve Lucian, who tels us, That it was Antipaters purpoſe to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that he was a ſtedfaſt enemie to the Macedonians; therefore diſcretion required that he ſhould be cut off.

The matters of Athens being thus ordered, the chief command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and lover of his Countrie, yet applying himſelf to the neceſſitie of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citie much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grievous to free-men, yet favourable to the vanquiſhed) he endeavoured carefully to preſerve.

How Craterus and Antipater were drawn from their Ætolian wars into Aſia. The grounds of the firſt civill war betweene the Macedonian Lords.

SO Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they ſtrengthened their friendſhip with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phila, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife.

Shortly after they went againſt the Ætolians, whoſe povertie was not ſo eaſily daunted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had bin. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, having many places of great faſtneſs, into which they conveyed ſuch of their goods as they moſt eſteemed, and of their people, as were leaſt fit for war: with the reſt they fortified the ſtrongeſt of their Cities, and ſo abode the coming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully reſiſted. With great obſtinacie did the Macedonians contend againſt the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had ſhut up all paſſages, and utterly debarred them of relief, then were they put to a miſerable choice, either to deſcend from their ſtrong holds, and fight upon equall ground, with unequall numbers, or to endure the miſeries of hunger and cold, againſt which they could make no long reſiſtance, or to yeeld themſelves to the Macedonians, who, incenſed by the loſſe of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave ſo ſtubborn enemies in places which might give confidence to rebellion. In caſes of extremitie, much fineneſs of wit apprehending all circumſtances of danger, commonly doth more hurt than a blunt conſideration of that only, which at the preſent is in hand. Theſe Ætolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily moleſted them: wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For ſuch newes came out of Aſia into the Macedonian Campe, as made Antipater and Craterus think every hour a moneth, till they had rid their hands of theſe Ætolians, giving them whatſoever conditions they would aſk; yet with purpoſe to call them to ſevere account; yea, to root them out of Greece by death, or by captivitie, when once they ſhould have ſettled the affairs of Aſia; as they hoped and deſired. But of mens purpoſes God is diſpoſer; in whoſe high counſell it was ordained, that this poor Nation ſhould continue a troubleſome bar to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into thoſe and other Provinces. Likewiſe concerning the matters of Aſia, this reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was ſo far from taking effect, that it ſerved meerly as an introduction to all the civill wars enſuing.

The grounds of the Aſiatique expedition, which did ſet the world in an uproar, were theſe. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captains the mightieſt in reputation; The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the preſent rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the beſt beloved, and moſt reſpected, both of Alexander and of the whole Army. Next unto theſe had Perdiccas been, whom the advantage of his preſence at the Kings death did make equall, or ſuperiour, to either of theſe, if not to both together. The firſt intents of Perdiccas were, to have conſorted with theſe two, and to have been with them a third partner in the government of all, to which purpoſe hee entertained the diſcourſe of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in ſhort ſpace the ſtrength of that gale of wind which bore him up, he began to take wing and ſoar quite another way. Arideus was a very ſimple man, yet ſerved well enough to wear the title of that Majeſtie, whereof Perdiccas being Adminiſtrator, and hoping to become proprietary, the practice was more ſevere than had been in the dayes of Alexander: the deſire to ſeem terrible, being very familiar with weak Princes, and their ambitious officers, who know no other means of preſerving themſelves from contempt, and of giving ſuch a fiery luſtre to their actions, as may dazle the eyes of the beholders. How cruelly the poor Greeks in the higher Aſia were all put to the ſword; and how tyrannouſly the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified hath already been ſhewed. The Piſidians were the next who felt the wrath of theſe counterfeit Alexanders. One City of theirs was utterly razed; the children ſold for ſlaves, and all the reſt maſſacred. The Iſaurians by this example grown deſperate, when after two or three dayes triall they found themſelves unable to continue the defence, lockt themſelves into their houſes, and ſet the Town on fire, into the flame whereof the young men did throw themſelves, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the walls.

Theſe exploits being performed, the Army had no other work than to ſift the aſhes of the burnt City for gold and ſilver; but Perdiccas had buſineſſe of greater importance troubling his brains. Nothing was more contrary to his ends, than to ſit ſtill without employment, letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whileſt others grew great, and took deep root in their ſeverall Provinces. He purpoſed therefore to tranſport his forces into Europe, under pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the ſeat of his Anceſtors, and head of the Empire. The Kings preſence would make the Offices of his Vice-Roys (during the time) actually voyd; Antipater with Craterus being once in caſe of private men, and only Perdiccas holding authority, the match with Cleopatra might eaſily be made. So ſhould greatneſſe meet with a good title; and what more could be wiſhed? Some impediment the power of Ptolomy might give, who held Egypt well fortified with men, but much better with love of the people; yet if the buſineſſe proſpered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomy would follow of himſelf, or be driven to come to reaſon. Antigonus likewiſe then governing in Phrygia, a buſie-headed man, and ill affected to the ſide, was to be looked into and made away, for fear of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in ſo thinking. Antigonus was as good a man of War, of as deep a judgement, as high a ſpirit, and as great undertaking, as any of Alexanders Captains. His imployments had been leſſe than ſome of theirs, which made him alſo the leſſe reſpected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for he valued himſelf by his own worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiccas, and ſounded the depth of his purpoſes, which it was now high time to diſcover. For Perdiccas having with a jealous eye pryed into the demeanour of Antigonus, and finding him no way fit for his turn, cauſed him to be charged with ſuch accuſations, as might ſuffice to take away his life, eſpecially by a Judge that ſought his death. This device Antigonus would not ſeem to perceive, but prepared himſelf in ſhew to make anſwer, indeed, to make eſcape; which eaſily he did, putting himſelf and his Son Demetrius aboard of ſome Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with ſuch tidings as finiſhed the Ætolian War before mentioned.

As the comming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifeſtly perceive their own danger: ſo his flight gave Perdiccas to underſtand that his intentions were layd open, and muſt now be juſtified by the ſword. Therefore he prepared as faſt as he could, not onely for defence, but (as having on his ſide the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing ſlack in providing to encounter him. Ptolomy being adverti-ſed of theſe proceedings, and conſidering how neerly they concerned him, ſided with Antipater. To his government of Egypt he had annexed the Dominion of Cyrene, not without conſent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the midſt of theſe garboyles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great ſolemnity, purchaſing thereby to himſelf much good will and many partakers, notwithſtanding the terrible report of the Kings Army comming againſt him.

§. VIII.

Perdiccas his voyage into Egypt, and his death.

Perdiccas, uncertain which way to bend his main power, at length resolved to [illegible] upon Ptolomy; leaving Eumenes to keep to his use, against Craterus and [illegible]ter, the parts of Asia bordering upon Europe.

It may seem strange, that he did not rather make head against those who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men than Ptolomy could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomy; or believed that Craterus would not be ready for him soon enough. Sure it is, that he took a bad course, and made it worse with ill handling.

Ptolomy by his sweet behaviour allured many to his parte, without help of any ill arts. Perdiccas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which never failed to be rewarded with hatred; that is truly defined, An affection founded upon opinion of an unjust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Egypt is not worth relation; for he did nothing of importance, but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was upon a little Town called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by night, with more haste than good heed; for Ptolomy preventing him, did put himself into the place, where behaving himself not only as a good Commander, but as a stout Souldier, he gave the foil to Perdiccas, causing him to retire with losse, after a vehement, but vain, assaule continued one whole day. The night following, Perdiccas made another journy, (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Nilus, over against Memphis. There with much difficultie he began to passe over his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incamp. The current was strong, the water deep, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants above the passage, to break the violence of the stream, and his horse-men beneath it, to catch such as were carried away by swiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie being passed over on the further bank, the channell began to wax deep, so that whereas the foremost companies had waded up to the chin, they who should have followed could find no bottome. Whether this came by the rising of the water, or sinking away of the ground, (the earth being broken with the feet of so many Men, Horse, & Elephants) no remedy there was, but such as had passed must repasse again, as well as they might: for they were too weak for the enemie, and could not be relieved by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the river, wherein above two thousand of them perished, a thousand were devoured by Crocodiles, a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger; such as were strong and could swim, recovered the Camp, many were carried down the stream, and driven to the contrary bank, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giving liberty to their tongues, which long time had concealed the evill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomy, which did set them in an uproare. Ptolomy had not only shewed much compassion on those who fell into his hands alive, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carkasses, which the river had cast upon his side: and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not only move the common Souldiers, but made the Captains fall to mutinie, thinking it unreasonable to make warre upon so vertuous and honourable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, using them like slaves. The faction growing strong, wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly hated Perdiccas, for the disgrace which he had suffered by his procurement, after the victorie upon the rebellious Greeks. Python had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the division of the Provinces made Governour of Media, he had followed Perdiccas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equall to him, had nevertheless been scornfully used by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captains, and a good part of the Horse, which consisted of the Gentrie, (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiccas, where without further circumstance they all ranne upon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud mis-governing authoritie of Perdiccas. Hee might have lived as great as any, could he have suffered any as great as himself; yea, peradventure master of all, had he not been too masterly over those which were already his.

The next day Ptolemie came into the Camp, where he was joyfully received; he excused himself of things past, as not having been Author, or given cause of the warre, and was easily beleeved: the favour of the Armie being such toward him, that needs they would have made him Protector in the room of Perdiccas. But this hee refused, it was an Office fit for one that would seek to increase his greatnesse with his trouble, whereas was well enough alreadie; wherefore, for his own quiet he forbare to accept it, and for their well-deserving of him, he procured that honourable charge to Pythen, and Arideus the Captain, who having had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexanders Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the middest of these businesses came news of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arrived two or three dayes sooner, had been entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Perdiccas, as had ended both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the ears which would have given them welcome, found bad entertainment, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Victories of Eumenes in the lower Asia.

BEfore we proceed in the relation of things happening about the person of the King, it is meet that we speak of those businesses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexterity, whilest Perdiccas was occupied in [illegible] Wars. Alcetas the brother of Perdiccas, and Neoptolemus, had received command from Perdiccas to be assistant to Eumenes, and to follow his direction. But Alcetas made slur answer that he would not, alleging the backwardnesse of his men to bear Armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus. Neoptolemus was content to make fair shew, but inwardly he repined at the precedency given to Eumenes, as thinking himself the better man. Eumenes discovering, through the counterfeited looks of Neoptolemus, the mischief lurking in his heart, wisely dissembled with him, in hope to win him by gentle behaviour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed upon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himself, that he might stand upon his own strength, he raised out of the Countries under his jurisdiction about six thousand horse, giving many privileges to such as were serviceable, and exercising them well up. Not without great need. For when upon advertisement of the great preparations made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellespont) for the invasion of his Provinces, he willed Neoptolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in hostile manner, though unprovoked, presented him battell. Neoptolemus had secretly covenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to perform, hee was shamefully disappointed. For though his foormen, being all Macedonians had much the better, and prevailed far upon Eumenes his battels; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himself compelled, with a few of them, to run away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men to be charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting down their Pikes, they cryed for mercy, and gladly took their oath to doe him faithfull service. Antipater and Craterus endeavoured with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their society, who contrariwise offered himself as a mean of reconciliation, between Perdiccas and Craterus, whom he dearly loved; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and constant faith to the cause which he had undertaken to maintain.

Whilest these negociations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Associates, vilifying Eumenes, & calling him a Scribe (at which foolish railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well he might) with high commendations, assuring them, that if Craterus did but once appear, or that his voyce were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Camp, the victory was wonne; for they would all forth with revolt unto him. Earnestly therefore he desired them to give him ayd against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Armie to be sent. Their own affections did easily lead them to condescend to his motion: and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevail as much as the force which he drew along. For he had in the middest of Alexanders vanities, when others (imitating their King) betook themselves to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian form of behaviour, and apparell, whereby he became very gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia with discontented eyes, as reproachfull and derogatory to the manners of their native Countrey. So Antipater took the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccas at bay, and to joyn with Ptolomy. Craterus used great celerity, to have taken Eumenes revelling (as hee hoped) according to the common fashion of Captains, after a great victory. But he had a wary and well-advised enemy to encounter, who kept good espiall upon him, and with much wisedome fore-saw all that was to be feared, and the means of prevention, which his courage did not fail to execute. Eumenes was not ignorant that Craterus was able to defeat him without battell, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Army following him: (yet the Army following him was such, as much exceeded his own in foot-men, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more uneasie to keep the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon he took in hand a strange piece of work, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wise managing prosperously accomplished. He gave out reports, that Neoptolemus was returned with such company as he could gather together, & had gotten Pigres (a Captain of no great estimation, who lay not far off) to joyn with him. Having animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom he knew to be despised & hated among them, (as having bin vanquished by some of them, and forsaken others in plain field, whilst they valiantly fought in his quarrel) he took great care to keep them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded that no messenger nor trumpeter should be admitted; & not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him had he bin known: but Thracians, Cappadocians and Persians, under the leading of such, as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiccas and himself. To these also he gave in charge, that without speaking or hearkning to any word, they should run upon the enemy; and give him no leasure to say, or do any thing but fight. The directions which he gave to others, he did not fail to executte in his own person: but placing himself in the right wing of his battell, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as he understood) conducted the left wing on the contrary side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and ready to charge the enemy as soon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay between them, which having ascended, the Armies discovered each other: but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journies, which over-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of frivolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in surprising them as enemies) to discover himself to his old friends, and fellow souldiers, of whom he could see none. Phœnix a Tenidian, & Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that side, who mindfull of their instructions, began to give upon him, with such countenance as told him his errour, which to redeem, he bad his men fight, and redeem the day, and take the spoyl to themselves; but the Bear whose skin he sels, is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battell was fought gave most advantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Neoptolemus, who as soon as they had discovered one another, could not contain themselves, but with great rage met body to body, & letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from under them, leaving both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus rose first up, but Eumenes had his sword first drawn, wherewith he houghed the other, causing him to fall down & fight upon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving slight ones, took such as were deadly, by which he dyed in the place, and was there (being half-dead, half-alive) stripped by his mortall enemy, whose revilings he requited, lying even at the last gasp, with one wound in the groin, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to run away upon the spurre, and seek shelter behind the battels of their foot. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himself to carry succour

...to his left wing, which he ſuſpected much to be diſaffected, but found occaſion ...with the ſame fortune, that had aſſiſted him when he fought in perſon. Craterus had ...ſome hurt of a while, and ſuſtained the impreſſion of Ariſtonous and Alcetas ...courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire ...of the fight, when he was charged by men of like eſtimation or none. Others ...is not unlikely, that he might have either earned the day, or preſerved himſelf ...adventure by giving ground, as that reſt (when he and Neoptolemus were dead) ...whilſt he fought to preſerve his reputation, he loſt his life by the fall of his ...or his falling from his horſe, through force of a wound received upon which occaſi... ...was trampled under foot by many that knew him not, and ſo periſhed unknown, ...was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great ...as having always loved and honoured Craterus, of whoſe death he was ...become the inſtrument. The vanquiſhed Army entertained a treaty of peace with ...making ſhew of willingneſſe to become his followers, but their intent was onely ...themſelves, which (by his permiſſion) having done, they ſtole away by night, ...toward Antipater.

This battell fought within ten dayes of the former, was to Eumenes more reputa... ...good will: for his own Souldiers took the death of Craterus heavily, and the ...lying further off were inraged with the news. But other matters there were ...which incenſed men againſt him, beſides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifeſtly ...ſeemed, that he was as ſorry as any that preſaged greater heavineſſe. His Army was ...ſpoil. This was a great fault, which he wiſely amended by giving to them the ſpoyle ...ſuch Towns as were ill-affected to him. So he redeemed the love of his own men, who ...of their meer motion appointed unto him a Guard for defence of his perſon. Others ...were not ſo eaſie to be reconciled. They who had been Traytors to Perdiccas, hated him ...for his faithfulneſſe, as greatly, as they thought he would have them for their faithood; ...either found they any fairer way of excuſing their late revolt, than by accuſing and con... ...demning the ſide which they had forſaken. Wherfore they proclamed Eumenes a Trai... ...tor, and condemned him to die; but it was an eaſier matter to give that ſentence, than to ...put it in execution.

§. XI.

Quarrels between Eurydice the Queen, and Python the Protector. Python reſigns his office, into which Antipater is choſen.

Python and Arideus being choſen Protectors of King Arideus, and the children of Alexander, took the way to Aſia the leſſe, conducting the Armie through Syria. Of theſe two, Python was the greater in reputation, yet far too weake to ſuſtain ſo important a charge. For Eurydice wife to King Arideus, was come to her husband, a Lady of a maſculine ſpirit, well underſtanding what ſhe was or ſhould be, and thinking her ſelf able to ſupport the weight which fortune layd upon her fooliſh husband, being due to her own title. Her Mother Cyna, ſiſter to Alexander, by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath been ſhewed) to Amyntas, who was the right Heir to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the only ſon of King Perdiccas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman, ſhe had led Armies, and (as a true ſiſter of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queen of the Phrygians, a Virago like unto her ſelf, had ſlain her. She brought up this Eurydice in the ſame unwomanly Art of Warre, who now among the Souldiers began to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the ſmall contentment of Python, that could not brook her too curious intermedling in his charge. Whether it were ſo, that Python had ſome purpoſe to advance the ſon of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome, (as once he had ſought to do;) or whether the Queen did ſuſpect him of ſome ſuch intent; or whether only deſire of rule cauſed her to quarrell with him, quarrell ſhe did, which diſturbed the proceeding of Eumenes. The Army having ſhaken off ſuch a rank-rider as Perdiccas, would afterward be reigned with a twined threed. Python bearing himſelf upon his office, took upon him to give directions in the Kings name, which the Queen did ſometimes contrarily uſing the ſame name, with more authority, and better liking of the Souldiers.

Python seeing this, would needs resign his office, whether upon weariness of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queen into envie, it is uncertain. Perhaps he thought, that now being the far worthiest man in the Camp, he should be intreated to retain the place, and have his authority confirmed, or (as might be) increased were it but for want of a fit Successor. Eurydice was nothing sorry at this course for now she thought to manage the affairs of the Empire at her own will, being freed from the troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the souldiers disappointed both her & Python of their contrary expectations, choosing Antipater, the only powerfull man of Alexanders Captains then living, into the room of Python. Hereat the Queen fretted exceedingly, and began to deal earnestly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord save only the King their Soveraign. Yet she failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seem) by three things: the apparent weakness of her husband; the growth of Alexanders children, who (though born of out-landish women) were bred in the Macedonian Camp; and the mightiness of Antipater, who commanding a great Army near at hand, arrived in few daies at the Camp, and enforced Eurydice to hold her self content. Antipater was of such power, that he needed not to work by any close devices as Perdiccas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Governors of Provinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better, yea many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their rooms. This done, he took the King, Queen, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus General of the Royall Army, to whom for his good services done, and to be done against Eumenes, he gave the rule of Susiana, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the government of Asia during that War.

§ XL.

Antigonus Lieutenant of Asia, wins a battell of Eumenes, and besiegeth him in Nora. He vanquisheth other followers of Perdiccas.

HEre begins the greatness of Antigonus, whose power in few years over-growing the rest, wanted little of spreading it self over the whole Monarchie. He was to make War upon Eumenes, Alcetas the brother, and Attalus the brother-in-law to Perdiccas: work enough to keep his Army imployed in the publike service, till such time as he might find occasion to make use of it in his own businesse. The first of these which he undertook was Eumenes, with whom Alcetas and Attalus refused to joyn, having unseasonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tryed all ways of corrupting his Souldierr, tempting first the whole Army with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himself had scattered abroad those letters to try the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captains as he thought most easie to be won. Of these Captains one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any help was near him, yet looking so carelessly to himself, that he and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies far off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treachery secret, reserving it for the time of execution. Upon confidence of the treason which this false man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus presented battel to Eumenes, in the heat wherof Apollonides, General of the horse to Eumenes, fled over to the contrary side, with such as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he desired not. Eumenes perceiving the irrecoverable mischief which this traiterous practice had brought upon him, pursued the villain, & cut him off before he could thrust himself into the troups of Antigonus, and boast of his treachery. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battell, which disabled him utterly to keep the field, & left it very hard for him to make a safe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himself to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victory to get possession of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whilest Antigonus held him in chase, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battell had been fought, there he burned (according the manner of the time) the bodies of his own men, men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captains and common Souldiers apart, raising up heaps of earth as mountains over them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians (returned to their Camp) great admiration of his brave spirit; so the newes which Menander (who was set to look unto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plain, careless, as after an assured victory, and loaden with the spoyles of many Nations, the rewards of their long service; all which he might have taken: but fearing lest such a purchase should prove a heavie burden to him, whose chief hope consisted in swift expedition, he gave secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountains, whilest he detained his men (whom authority could not have restrained) by his sleight, setting them to bait their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborn when it lay in his power to sit up them out of all their wealth, and make their children slaves, and to ravish their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborn to do this out of any good will to them; but out of meer subtlety had avoyded those precious fetters, which would have hindred his speedy flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not only think all carriages to be over-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublesome than availeable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, willing them to shift for themselves, and retaining only five hundred horse, and two hundred foot. When he had wearied Antigonus a while in following him up and down, he came to Nora: where again keeping no more about him than necessitie required to make good the place, he lovingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little fortresse in the borders of Lycaonia and Cappadocia, so strongly situated, that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualled and stored with all necessaries, that it might hold out for many years. Thither did Antigonus follow him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in War. To this purpose he entertained parley with him, but in vain. For, whereas Antigonus offered him pardon and his love; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed up; where Antigonus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, took his journy into Pisidia, against Alcetas and Attalus, with whom he made short work. He came upon them unexpected, and seised on passages, which wanted not men, but such a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetas and Attalus, as they had been too secure before his comming, so were they too adventurous, in fighting at the first sight, upon all disadvantages: and their folly was attended with suitable event. Attalus with many principall Captains was taken; Alcetas fled to the City of Termessus, where the love of the younger sort toward him was so vehement, that stopping their ears against all perswasions of the ancient men, they needs would hazzard their lives and their Country in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: for the Governors of the Town having secretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the young men to sally out; and using the time of advantage, they with their servants did set upon Alcetus, who unable to resist, slew himself. His dead body was conveyed to Antigonus, and by him barbarously torn, was cast forth without buriall. When Antigonus was gone, the young men interred the carcasse with solemn funerals, having once been minded to set on fire their own town in revenge of his death. Such favour had he purchased with courteous liberality: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, how great soever, is insufficient.

§. XII.

Ptolomie wins Syria and Phœnicia. The death of Antipater.

WHilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes lay idle, rather seeking to enjoy their Governments for the present, than to confirm or enlarge them. Only Ptolomie looking abroad, wan all Syria and Phœnicia: a action of great importance, but not remarkeable for any circumstance in the managing. He sent a Lieutenant with an Army who quickly took Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccas; but (as may seem) without any great strength of Souldiers, far from assistants, and vainly relying upon the authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintain him in his Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. He had with him Polysperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders Captains, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Ætolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, prevailing far at the first, but soon losing all that they had gained, whilest Atipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polysperchon Antipater did repose great confidence, so far forth, that (suspecting the youth of his own Son Cassander of insufficiencie in so great a charge) he bequeathed unto him on his death-bed the government of Macedon and Greece, together with his office of Protectorship. So Antipater died, being fourscore years old, having alwayes travelled in the great affairs of mighty Princes, with such reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was jealous of him, and the successors of Alexander did either quietly give place unto him, or were unfortunate in making oppositions. In his private qualities he was a subtle man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosophicall behaviour not unlearned, as having been Scholar to Aristotle, and written some Histories. He had been much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother, whom after the death of her Son, he compelled to abstain from comming into Macedonia, or entermedling in matters of Estate: yea, at his own death he gave especiall direction, that no woman should be permitted to deal in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soon forgotten; and yet ere long, by sorrowfull experience approved to have been sound and good.

§. XIII.

Of Polysperchon, who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against him.

Polysperchon was very skilfull in the Art of Warre, having long time been Apprentise in that occupation; other qualities, requisite in so high an Office as hee under-went, either Nature had not given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He managed his businesse more formally than wisely, as a man of a second wit, fitter to assist, than command in chief. At the first entrance upon the stage, he called to counsell all his friends, wherein for weighty considerations (as they who weighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queen Olympias was revoked out of Epyrus into Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For, the condition of the times requiring, that the Governours of Provinces abroad should keep greater Armies, than were needfull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all Majesty, that might give authority to the Injunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard contain within the limited bounds of dutie such as could not by force have been kept in order, being strong, and lying too farre off.

Such care was taken for prevention of imaginary dangers and out of sight, whilest present mischiefes lay unregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was not able to discover that great sufficiencie in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much confidence: neither could he discern such odds in the quality of himself and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was left Captain of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seems to imply. Hee should thereby have been as Camp-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himself the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his own power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relyed on his father, were his own assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authority, in those Common-weals, whose forms had been corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw-in many partakers: it concerned these men in their own particular to adhere unto the Captains, by whom their faction was up-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, covetous of re-gaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised over the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obeying their betters perforce. Besides all these helps, Cassander had the secret love of Queen Eurydice, Eurydice, who had in private rendred him such curteſie, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queens favour, nor all his other poſſibilities, gave him confidence to break out into open rebellion; becauſe he ſaw Polyſperchon much reverenced among the Macedonians, and ſtrong enough to ſuppreſſe him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made ſhew of following his pleaſures in the Countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, adviſed with them upon the ſafeſt courſe, and moſt free from all ſuſpicion. The neceſſitie was apparent of raiſing an Armie, before the buſineſſe was ſet on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie preſented him with fair means. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commiſſion, annexed Syria to his government of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to truſt him with, or for him to part with. Antigonus upon the firſt newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold upon all that he could get, in ſuch ſort, that he manifeſtly diſcovered his intent of making himſelf Lord of all Aſia. Theſe two therefore ſtood in need of a civill war; which Caſſander wel noted, & preſumed withall, That the friendſhip which had paſſed between his father and them, would avail him ſomewhat. Whereupon he ſecretly diſpatched meſſengers to them both; and within a little while conveyed himſelf on a ſudden over the Helleſpont, that he might in perſon advance the buſineſſe with greater ſpeed. Much perſwaſion is needleſſe in winning a man to what he deſireth. Antigonus coveting nothing more, than to find Polyſperchon work, by raiſing ſome commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities muſt not be neglected) Caſſander did very earneſtly preſſe him, by the memorie of his Father, and all requiſite conjurations, to aſſiſt him in this enterpriſe; telling him, that Ptolomie was ready to declare for them, and urging him to a ſpeedy diſpatch. Antigonus on the other ſide repaied him with the ſame coin, ſaying, That for his own ſake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearly loved, he would not fail to give him all manner of ſuccour. Having thus feaſted one another with words, they were nothing ſlack in preparing the common meanes, leading to their ſeverall ends.

§. XIV.

The unworthy courſes held by Polyſperchon, for the keeping down of Caſſander.

GReat neceſſitie there was of timely proviſion. For, Polyſperchon needed no other inſtructions to inform him of Caſſanders drift, than the newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready diſpoſition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the ſtrengthening of rebellion; and well he knew that one principall hope of Caſſander was repoſed in the confidence of ſuch as ruled in the Grecian Eſtate. Therefore (loving to work circumſpectly) he called another Councell, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular form of Government ſhould be erected in all the Cities of Greece; the Garriſons withdrawn; and that all Magiſtrates and principall Men, into whoſe hands Antipater had committed the ſupreme authoritie, ſhould forthwith be either ſlain or baniſhed. This was a ſure way to diminiſh the number of Caſſanders friends, and to raiſe up many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was diſcloſed both an unthankfull nature in Polyſperchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For, how could he be excuſed of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the ſon went about to diſhonour the Fathers actions, whoſe onely bountie had inabled him to doe it? Or what could be ſaid in their defence, who ſought to deſtroy many worthie men, friends to the State, by whom the Greeks were held reſtrained from ſtirring againſt the Macedonians? and in oppoſition to their private enemie, gave the rule of things to baſe Companions, and ſuch as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans body, through ſinews newly iſſuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next neighbour, than by any diſtemper in the contrary hand: ſo in bodies politique, the humours of men, ſubdivided in faction, are more inraged by the diſagreeable qualities of ſuch as curb them in their neereſt purpoſes, than they are exaſperated by the generall oppoſition of ſuch as are divided from them in the main trunk. Hereby it comes to paſſe, that contrary religions are invited to help againſt neighbour Princes; bordering enemies drawn in, to the part in civill warres; and ancient hatred called to counſell againſt injurious friends. Of this fault nature is not guiltie; ſhee hath taught the arm to offer it ſelf unto manifeſt loſſe in defence of the head: They are depraved affections, which render men sensible of their own particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

The decree, whereby the Greeks were presented with a vain shew of libertie, ran under the Kings name; but so, as one might easily discern, that Polysperchon had guided his pen. For the main point was, That they should follow such directions, as Polysperchon gave, and treat with him about all difficulties. In the rest it contained such a deal of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appear to have some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it self too base and unfit for a King to use toward his conquered Subjects, and often-subdued Rebels.

§. XV.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by Polysperchons decree. The death of Phocion.

NEvertheless the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happy-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captain of the Garrison, which kept one of their Havens, called Munychia, in the lower part of the Town, would needs take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hastie desires.

Nicanor, as a trustie follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captain there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soon after hearing the newes of Antipater's death, cried out upon Phocion, saying, That he had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might, by advertising them in due time, have put into their hands a fair opportunitie of thrusting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a desire to shake off the Macedonian yoke. Farre more grievously would they have been offended, had they known the instructions which Cassander had given to Nicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not onely retain Munychia, any injunction to the contrary notwithstanding; but that hee should find means to thrust some companies into Piraeus, and fortifie that also, which was the principall haven, against the high-town. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giving him sufficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. They desired him to come unto their Councell, assembled in the Piraeus, there to consider of the Kings Proclamation: whither upon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the war which was ready to break forth. Contrariwise, they urged him first of all, to make them masters of their own, which how to use, they might consult afterwards. Each of them refusing to condescended unto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwayes measure justice by profit, yet seldom thrived by that course) practised with Dercillus, a Captain following Polysperchon, and then lying neer at hand; that he should enter into the Town, and take Nicanor prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athens, a man very unlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with such a trick of politick dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and save himself.

Nicanor hereupon began to devise upon taking Piraeus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his own just revenge. He levied as many Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piraeus, took it, and intrenched himself therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Haven, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the son of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recovering all, and addressed themselves unto him; who made fair shewes, intending meer mischief, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vain Epistles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queen. Olympias, taking upon her to command, before she durst well adventure to return into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Nicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider more of the matter. Polysperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeed) so far from purposing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did not throughly intend to let them have themselves. The commoditie of their Havens was such, as he would rather get into his own hands, than leave in theirs; yet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His Son Alexander, not ignorant of this, made fair shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labour, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew jealous, and the displeasure they conceived against him, they poured out upon Phocion, depriving him of his office. This was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers thrusting themselves into the assembly of the Citizens, who distracted with sundrie passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought every one that best could inveigh against things past, a most likely man to find some remedie for the evill threatning them. In this hurly-burly was Alexander devising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, & held much privie conference with him; which he could not so secretly carry, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the uproare in the Town was so far increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seek safeguard of their lives by flight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gave them his letters of commendation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, ready to enter with an Army into Attica. Thither came Phocion with his companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their own deserts, (having alwaies been friends to the Macedonians, as far as the good of their Countrie gave leave) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchons familiar friend, went along with them (in an evill hour) who promised to himself and them great favour, by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an unstable man, very earnest in what he took in hand, yet, either for want of judgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the best of them, easily changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halves, which made him commonly fail of good successe. For fear of Cassander he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians, this had caused them to love him: out of their love he gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his mind, and seek how to get into his own hands those keys, with which Cassander held them fast lockt up; finding himself disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a false dishonourable man, he stood wavering between the contrary allurements of profit and reputation. To keep the Athenians perforce at his devotion, would indeed have done well but the effecting of this began to grow desperate, and many Towns of importance in Greece began to cast their eys upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wisest way to redeem their good opinion, by giving all contentment unto the populat faction, which was then grown to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Embassadours come, treading (as one may say) upon Phocions heels, whom they were sent to accuse. These had solemn audience given to them in the Kings presence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for ostentations sake was glorified with all exteriour shews of Majestie; yet all too little to change Aridæus into Alexander: for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as he saw others doe. For beginning of the businesse Polysperchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and slain. This was enough to testifie his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake, whose Embassadours he then bad to speak. When their errand was done, and answer to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were pronounced guilty of treason; but to give sentence, and doe the execution upon them, was (for honours sake) referred unto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgesses. Then were they sent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not suffering them to speak for themselves, condemned them to dye. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocion being very conspicuous, made the fortune of the rest to be of the lesse regard. Five and fortie times had he been chosen Governour of the Citie, never suing for the place, but sent for when he was absent, so well was his integritie known, and so highly valued, even of such as were no pretenders to the same vertue. He was a good Commander in War, wherein though his actions were not very great, yet were they of good importance, and never unfortunate. Never did the Citie repent of having followed his counsell: nor any private man of having trusted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him, so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signs of his love) sent him two hundred talents of silver, and offered to bestow upon him of four Cities in Asia any one which he would choose. But Phocion refused these and other gifts, howsoever importunately thrust upon him; resting well contented with his honest povertie: wherein he lived above fourscore years, and then was compelled by the unjust judgment of wicked men, to drink that poyson, which by just judgment of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it never brought forth any worthy man resembling the vertue of their Ancestors.

§. XVI.

Of Polysperchon his vain expedition against Cassander.

NOt long after these things were done, Cassander, with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Piraeus; which newes drew Polysperchon headlong into Attica, with a great Armie, but so ill victualled, that he was fain to depart without any thing done. Only he had given some impediment to the enemie, who, not contented with defending what he held, began to look out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therfore himself unable to drive Cassander out of Athens, he left his son Alexander with such number of men as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to withstand his further incroaching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrie sure to himself, wherein Cassander had many Friends.

His doings in Peloponnesus were such, as they had been in other parts of Greece. First, he began to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratie, or Popular form of government. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater been made Rulers, should be either slain, or driven into exile. This decree took immediate effect in most places: The vulgar sort being very readie to seal the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the bloud of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chief Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteen thousand serviceable men, well furnished of necessaries, and resolved to endure the worst. And need there was of such resolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power, did so much, that he overthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall between them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised up an inner wall, to bear out the next assault. The Assailants having failed to carry the Town at the first attempt, took much pain to clear the ground, and make fair way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to overthrow all that came in their way. But the Townsmen perceiving their drift, prepared boords driven through with long nails, which they used as gal-throps, bestowing them sleightly covered, with the points upwards, in the way by which the beasts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certain light-armed men to beat upon their sides with arrows and Darts, as they were instructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Wars. Of these provisions they made happy use in the next assault. For, by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemie chiefly trusted) either sorely hurt, or driven back upon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polysperchon came as ill furnisht for long abode to Megalopolis as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leasure as was requisite, he forsook the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour, leaving some part of his Army to lye before the Town for his credit.

After this he sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to joyn with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemie out of Asia. Cassander also sent his whole fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where he fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonus hearing of the over-throw, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor again, assuring him of the victorie, as well he might. For he sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom he caused to be wafted over the streights in small Vessels by night; these before day-light setting upon Clitus, drave his men, that lay securely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving did assail them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good facultie in penning bloudie decrees, but when the execution was referred to his own sword, he could find the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceiving that he had left them to shift for themselves, and was not able to give them protection against the enemy which lay in their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a governour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had left them. The like inclination to the partie of Cassander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted unto him, as to an industrious man, and likely to prevail in the end. Thus was the whole Countrie set in a combustion, uneasie to be quenched; which presented unto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himself Lord of Asia.

§. XVII.

Antigonus seeks to make himself an absolute Lord: and thereupon treats with Eumenes, who disappointeth him, Phrygia and Lydia won by Antigonus.

Antigonus had in Antipaters life-time a firm resolution, to make unto himself the utmost benefit that he might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in fair season for advancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; even then, when all the businesse in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more employment for the Armie remaining, save onely the continuance of the siege of Nora, a small thing of it self, but as hard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the present Estate was manifestly subject, would in continuance of some years (which he might abide) work more for him, than his enemies in that space could work against him. His most fear was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men & horses might grow sickly and unserviceable: which made him to practise many devices of keeping them in health and lustie. But when he had continued shut up in this manner about a year, his hopes came to good passe, and he was eased of his cares by Antigonus himself, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiencie of Eumenes, and considering his fidelity shewed unto Perdiccas, thought that he could not find in all the world a fitter man than him, to employ in managing those high designs, wherein he doubted not that he should be withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. He sent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a better Lord than ever he had bin, and the next man to himself, if things fel out as he desired: in regard whereof he required only his friendship, & therupon sent him an oath to take, which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and enjoy his perfect libertie. Eumenes perusing the form of the oath, did perceive the meaning of Antigonus, which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keep the Decorum, than upon any loyall intent; the binding words and sum of all were such, as tied him fast only to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of duty to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it unseemly to become a sworn man to him, with whom he had fought for the masterie; and being assured that his voluntarie assistance, which way soever he gave, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would he not therefore break off the negotiation, and wait for some better occasion of inlargement, which might perhaps be long in comming: but seeming to be well agreed with Antigonus, he prepared to give up his Hold and depart. As for the oath it self, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemn enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in testifying their allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gave him leave to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himself to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he departed.

Antigonus had taken upon him, as soon as he came down to the Sea-side, to remove some of the Governours of the Provinces, behaving himself according to the authoritie which he had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of war. Neither did he want sufficient pretence whereby to justifie his proceedings. For if Polysperchon might lawfully hold the Protectorship, which the old man doing on his death-bed bequeathed unto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes and Souldiers; why might not he himself as well retain the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted unto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordain what should seem convenient whilst he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen after his death? To give a fair colour to his ambition, this was enough: if any were not herewith satisfied, hee had threescore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, and thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answer them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Arideus Governor of Phrygia; who fortified the Towns of his own Province, and sought to have won Cizicus, a fair Haven Town, and seated very conveniently for him, but was fain to goe away without it. Hereupon Antigonus took occasion to command him out of the countrie. Arideus was so far from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieve Eumenes. Nevertheless finding that he was unable of himself to make long resistance, he took such companies as he could draw along with him, and so passed over into Europe, to complain at the Court. The like fortune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and sought the like remedy of his fortune, with some hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

§. XVIII.

Antigonus pursues Eumenes. Eumenes having authoritie from the Court, raiseth great war against Antigonus in defence of the Royall house.

Antigonus having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of all Asia the lesse, was able to have entred Macedon, and seized upon the Court; which that he forbare to doe, it proceeded (as may seem) from some of these reasons. It would have bred as much jealousie in Cassander, as fear in Polysperchon, which might have brought them to termes of reconciliation; It would ask more time than he could spare; and the envie which followed the Protectorship was such, as he that had power enough without the office, ought rather to shun, than to pursue. Besides all this, it was manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war upon him in defence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not stand well-affected. Against him therefore he bent his course, and with an Armie of twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppresse him before he should be able to make head.

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being well known in the Court, he had commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make war upon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as he should need. Other letters also there were directed to all the Governours of Provinces, requiring them to give assistance to Eumenes, and be ordered by his direction: especially to the Captains of the old Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or silver-shielded bands, commandement was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, before this authority was given him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Royall bloud. Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her, and her Nephew the son of Alexander, and in the meantime to give her his advice in that which Polysperchon required of her: for shee was desirous to return into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counselled her to remain in Epirus, till such time as he could bring the warre to a good issue; which done, he promised that his faith and care should not be wanting to the seed of Alexander.

Strange it is to consider, that in all the Empire, scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wives, and children, might repose firm confidence, saving onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian bloud, born at Cardia, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his own vertue had made it, his followers obeyed at their own discretion; and compelled he was to travail as farre as Persia, to gather together an Army sufficient to resist the enemies that pursued his heels.

§. XIX.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. Olympias takes Aridæus and Eurydice, whom she cruelly puts to death.

NOw, forasmuch as in this present Warre all the Rulers of the Provinces did entermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Asia, but Macedon it self, which brought a new face unto the State, by the extirpation of the Royall house of Philip and Alexander: I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the particulars of the Warre it self, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what passions they were drawn into those courses, which over-threw most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremity the faction brake out in Macedon it self, about the main controversie of the title to the Crown, whereupon all other quarrels were or should have been depending.

Aridæus the King, being simple and fearfull, did onely what he was bidden.

Polysperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the son of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdome, and become Governour to a King of his own making.

Eurydice the Queen discovering plainly this intent, and meaning nothing lesse than to let her husband serve as a Stale, keeping the throne warm till another were grown old enough to sit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turn.

Cassander held fresh in mind the danger wherein his family had been through Alexanders malice, together with the indignity offered to himself by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof, and the pleasure which he took in the amorous Queen, made him to resolve, both to suppresse the linage which he hated, and to maintain his beloved mistresse, either by supporting her weak husband, or by taking her to be his own wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indifferent who reigned over all, so as they might reign in their severall Countries, and establish their authority in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among these, Ptolomy and Antigonus were well enough already, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Lisimachus and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach upon their neighbours. Against these, Perdiccas, and some others, which much adoe hardly made resistance, untill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himself great matters, which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queen (as it is common with step-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wives. It was thought that she had given poison to Aridæus, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his body and wits. Now she considering, that Eumenes was too full of businesse to come home so soon as she wished that he should, and that Cassander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to join with Polysperchon, & set up, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the son of Roxane, removing Aridæus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so took her way towards Polysperchon, who

Eurydice hearing these news, wrote very earnestly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. She her self by entreaty, gifts, and promises, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as she could, untill she thought her own side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against Olympias, and the Traitor Polysperchon.

These two Queens met armed, as if the matter should have been determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Eurydice. For as soon as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reigns of her husband and son, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her self thus forsaken, fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted, and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias having obtained this victory without bloud, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and upon the same considerations for which they had refused to bear Arms against her, the Macedonians would not stick to maintain her, whatsoever her proceedings were. Having therefore shut up Aridaus and his wife in a close room, where they could scarce turn round, she fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head (for fear lest the people should have commiseration of him, that had reigned almost six years and a half) to put them to death. So she delivered Aridaus to some barbarous Thracians; who took away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice she sent a sword, a halter, and a cup of poison, willing her to choose the instrument of her own death; who praying that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yeelded her neck to the halter, having spent her last curses not in vain. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chief of his friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom she commanded to be slain. His brother Iolaus that was already dead and buried, she accused of poison given to Alexander, and thereupon caused his Tomb to be thrown down, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondring at this fury, began to condemn themselves, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrary to Antipaters charge given on his death bed, called this outragious woman to the government of the Empire.

§. XX.

How Cassander was revenged upon Olympias.

§. I.

The great expedition of Cassander. Olympias shuts her self into Pydna, where Cassander besieged her. Æacides King of Epirus, comming to succour Olympias, is forsaken, and banished by his own Subjects.

Cassander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponnesus; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, he never staied to take the City, nor to give order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the son of Polysperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, he willed his associats to look to themselves as well as they could, till his return; and so in all haste he took his journey towards Macedon, carried headlong with the greedie desire of just revenge. The Ætolians had taken the Streights of Thermopyla, in favour of the Queen & Polysperchon, to hinder his passage, but he, not willing to mis-spend any time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could, great and small, with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his companies, appointing some under Callas, a subtile Captain, to hold Polysperchon busied, who then lay incamped neer to Perhabia; with the rest he marched directly against Olympias. She, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignity, took more care how to appear Majesticall, than to make her self strong. To this end she made a solemn progresse to Pydna, a Sea-town, and well fenced, having in her company all the flowr of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her young son Alexander, heir to the great Alexander, by his grand-mothers designment: who during his minority kept his Soveraign power in her own hands. But all this pomp ſerved to little uſe, againſt the violence of the enemy, that ſoon preſented himſelf before the walls; only it fed the beſieged with a vain hope of ſuccour, that would from all parts arrive, to reſcue perſons of their quality. And hereof there ſoon appeared fair likelihood, which as ſoon vaniſhed, and went away in ſmoak.

For Æacides King of Epirus, made great haſte to bring ſuccour to Olympias his couſen, with whom Deidamia his daughter was alſo ſhut up. Nevertheleſſe, his Subjects were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certain paſſages taken in the way by Caſſanders men, they called upon him to retire, & quit the enterpriſe. The Kings importunitie urging them to proceed, and the obſtinate refuſall of the Army, brake out at length into ſuch termes, that when he had raged in vain againſt the multitude, his authority, with which he thought to have prevailed upon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to forſake his Kingdom, and to wander up and down in forrain Countries a baniſhed man, his people joyning with the enemy, againſt whom he had led them forth to war.

Pydna in the mean time was cloſed up ſtreightly, both by Sea and Land, ſo that neither any could iſſue out of the City, nor any relief be conveyed into it, but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable ſervice being done there, whilſt great actions were managed abroad.

§. II.

A continuation of Olympias her ſtory. Polyſperchon defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. Olympias yeelds to Caſſander.

NOw, though order of time require it, that we ſhould rehearſe the doings of Eumenes & Antigonus in this place, leaving Olympias yet a while to the hour of her deſtiny; which grows the faſter upon her, becauſe ſhe may diſcern it comming: yet that we may not be compelled to interrupt the courſe of our narration, by inſerting her Tragedie in the midſt of things not manifeſtly coherent with it; we will here (as elſewhere we have done, and elſewhere muſt) continue to an end one Hiſtory, that we may not be therewith diſtracted, when we ſhall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the beſieged, remaining in Polyſperchon, was in like manner diſappointed as their former truſt had bin, which was repoſed in the ſuccours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was ſent againſt him, found the means to corrupt the greateſt part of his Army with money, leaving him within a little while ſo ſlenderly accompanied, that he was fit for no other buſineſſe of war, than a ſwift retrait. When famine had ſo far prevailed in the City, that the horſes were killed as a precious food, many men, feeding on the dead carcaſſes of their fellows, and ſaw-duſt being given to the Elephants for provender; ſome of the Souldiers obtaining the Queens leave, (who could not deny it) others, without asking leave, yeelded themſelves to the enemy, and were by him gently relieved, and ſent abroad into the Country. The news of the Queens affairs, diſperſed by theſe men, did ſo affright her well-willers, that ſuch as had reſerved themſelves to the event, came in apace, and ſubmitted them to Caſſander. At length, when the mortalitie was ſo great in the Town, that the living were even poiſoned with the noyſome ſent of the dead, Olympias bethought her ſelf of ſtealing away by Sea in a Galley that ſhe had: wherewith her ſucceſſe was as bad as in the reſt. For God had appointed this Town, by her choſen as a place of refuge, to be unto her as a houſe of torment, and a Jaol, out of which ſhe ſhould not be delivered, but unto an evill death. Being therfore utterly broken with miſerie, which had affliicted her and the other Ladies, unaccuſtomed to ſo wretched a kind of life, ſhe offered compoſition, & with much labor hardly obtained of Caſſander (who having fetcht her Gally out of the Haven, accounted himſelf as good as maſter of her body) a grant of her own life. Immediatly upon her apprehenſion, Pella, the chief City of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Caſſander. Amphipolis did ſtand out: for Ariſtonus (to whom Olympias had given charge of ſuch forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the ſucceſſe of ſome petty ſervices wherein he had prevailed) began to promiſe himſelf great unlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win Caſſanders favour, very earneſtly required him upon on his faith to her, that he should give it up. He did so, and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Cassander, who partly hated him upon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seek innovation.

§. III.

The death of Olympias, and her conditions.

WHen Olympias had now heard sorrowfull tidings of all her friends, she her self was called into question, & accused in an assembly of the Macedonians, for the murthers (they were so stiled in her affliction, which in time of prosperity she called justice) by her committed. There was she (being not heard, nor called to speak) condemned to die. The sute was commenced and prosecuted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slain. But it was at Cassanders instigation, who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her with a ship, and other necessaries, to save her self by flight: which when she refused, saying, that she would plead for her self, and tell her own tale, he dissembled no longer, but sent unto her such men, as hated her most, who took away her miserable life. She was daughter, and sister, unto two Kings of Epirus; wife, and mother, unto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of unreproveable chastity; but her ambition was boundless, her hatred unappeasable, and her fury in revenge most unwomanly. Her perverse conditions made her husband seek other wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him, and them. She was thought privie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly she slew his late wife Cleopatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beastly fury broiled the other alive in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her son Alexander (otherwise loving her well) forbad her to meddle in the government of Macedon. But God, more severe unto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to live and fulfill the rest of her wickednesse, (which was his justice upon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others;) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it upon her own head.

§. IV.

Cassander celebrates the funerall of Aridæus and Eurydice; and seeks to make himself King of Macedon.

AFter her death, Cassander gave honourable buriall to Aridæus and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his own possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Thessalonica, whom he had taken at Pydna, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wives; that by her he might have some title to the Crown. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her young son to close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his fame, and purchase love, built a City, called by his own name Cassandria, that soon grew to be very great and powerfull. He re-edified likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it unto the old inhabitants, after it had lain twenty years waste, being utterly razed by Alexander. By these means, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that few remained enemies unto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could resist him. Leaving him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will return to them, who contended in Asia, for lesse titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONUS got in Asia.

The journey of Eumenes into Persia. His wise dealing with those that joyned with him.

EUMENES, having joyned unto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Eastern parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himself against Antigonus. He took his journey through Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, hoping to reclaim those Provinces, usurped with the rest of Syria (as hath been shewed) by Ptolomy, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Army too little, and the readinesse of the people to return their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the lesse effectuall. The Captains of the Argyraspides were so froward, that they scorned to repair to him, and take his directions; and their fidelity was so unsteady, that he might more easily have dealt with open traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; rather lay it in his power to keep them in order by expulsion. Therefore he feigned, that Alexander had appointed unto him, in a dream, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich pavilion, wherein an empty throne was placed, as if Alexander himself had been present at their consultations. Thus he freed himself from their vain pride; but of their faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Ptolomy requested them, and Antigonus bribed them to forsake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So he marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant; which Pytho and Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the Kings authority, but excepting the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Army, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to rely upon their assistance, who stood otherwise affected than his affairs required, and were not to be dealt with by perswasion, sought passage by strong hand through the Country of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, having in vain assaied to hinder him, by opening the sluices of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as desirous to be rid of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Eastern Lords, who were glad of his company, because of the differences between Pytho, Seleucus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superiority grew very hot among them, every one finding matter enough to feed his own humour of self-worthinesse. But the former devise of assembling in one pavilion, made all quiet, the conclusion ever being fitted to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wisest in giving advice, and best able to reward, by means of the authority given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these means he won to himself many of those, who had most power to do good or hurt.

§. II.

How Antigonus, comming to set upon Eumenes, was driven off with losse.

ANtigonus, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest desire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soon as he had made himself strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Seleucus, with their men, he marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battell. Eumenes had fortified the Castle of Susa, and was retired back toward Persia, keeping the River of Tigris between him and his pursuers. The passages of the River were well guarded, and good espiall kept upon Antigonus, to observe which way he took.

Before he came to Tigris it self, he was to passe over Coprates, a great River, and not foordable, which he sought to doe by small vessels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Army had gotten over, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge upon Tigris, came with a thousand horse, and four thousand foot, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and drave them headlong back into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned; very few escaping with life, except four thousand that yeelded themselves prisoners in sight of Antigonus, that was not able to relieve them. This losse made Antigonus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Countrie in the dog-dayes, breeding diseases in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remove as farre as into Media. So he took Python with him; (leaving Seleucus to besiege the Castle of Susa) and seeking to go the neerest way, passed through savage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arrive in Media, with his troups that were quite beaten and broken.

of Eumenes his cunning. A battell between him and Antigonus.

After his departure, Eumenes with his associates fell into consultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Fain he would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behind him; to which also the Captains of the Argyraspides or Silver-shields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw neerer to Greece. But Peucestes, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their own particular Estates, and would needs march Eastward. That carried it; for the Army was not strong enough to divide it self into parts.

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, feasted them royally, and sought by all means to win the Souldiers love to himself. Eumenes perceiving whereunto those doings tended, suffered him a while to keep good chear, till the time of war drew neer. Then did he feign an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Governor of Armenia, to Peucestes himself: The purport whereof was, that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent over a great Army under Polysperchon, to joyn with Eumenes. These newes, as they filled the Camp with vain joy, so they wrought in all mens minds a great willingnesse to obey Eumenes, by whom was the likeliest appearance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, hee being farre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soon after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew neer unto them, Eumenes by some mischance was fallen sick, and fain to be carried in a Litter; the Army marched in very bad array, and was likely to have been forced to take battell in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captains were amazed, was carried about the Army in his Litter, and upon the sudden did cast his men into so good form, that Antigonus, perceiving him a far off, could not refrain from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captains, and all sorts of men, if they would forsake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the triall of a battell. Eumenes had more Elephants that Antigonus; otherwise, he was inferiour in number both of horse and foot by a third part. The battell was fought with variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and of the night following. Yet the victory was uncertain. For Eumenes could not force his men to lye farre from their carriages: by which means Antigonus (who had a more absolute command over his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the sign of victory; for he buried his own, and gave leave to his enemies craving it, to do the like. But a greater sign of victory had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not only buried his men very honourably, at great leisure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonus was glad (having tarried but one day) to steal away by night, and return into Media, from whence he came.

§. IV.

Of divers stratagems practised by Antigonus, and Eumenes, one against the other.

THus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greater length, each part having stout Souldiers, and skilfull Generalls: but the side which had hitherto prevailed, being hindred by the equall authority of many, from putting all advantages to the best, Antigonus grew daily weaker, in men and reputation, so that to repair himself he could find no way safer, than to put all to adventure. He knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered far asunder, so that if hee could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Between him and them the way was not long, being only nine daies journey, but very bad through a rough drie wildernesse, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Country well peopled, but requiring 15. daies journey, he forsook, partly for the length, partly, and chiefly, because he would come undiscovered. So therefore taking his journy in the dead of winter, he forbade unto his men the use of fire by night, because he would not have them descried a farre off. This commandement had been well observed four or five daies, when continuance of time (as commonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neer to their waies end. The light of these fires gave notice of their comming, which being reported to Peucestes, and other Captains, they were so astonished with the sudden danger, that in all haste they betook themselves to flight. But Eumenes, meeting with the newes, began to heare on his affrighted companions, promising to make Antigonus march leisurely, and willing them to abide, and draw up their men together. They could scarce believe him, yet they were content to be ruled, and did as he appointed, who failed not in making his word good. He took with him some companies of the readiest men, where with hee occupied certain tops of mountains, looking toward the Camp of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient ground to incamp upon, and made great store of fires in sundry places, as if the whole Armie had been present. This was a sorrowfull spectacle to Antigonus, who thought himself prevented of his purpose, and began to fear lest he should be compelled to fight, whilest his men were tired with a long and painfull journey. Therefore he resolved to turn aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serve to refresh his Army. This he did with great care and circumspection, at the first, as knowing how ready Eumenes would be upon all advantages. But after a while, considering that no enemy stirred about him, he began to pause, and think in himself, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that desart to be taken, and brought before him; of whom hee learned, that they had seen no other Army than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on the hill tops. It vexed him exceedingly to find that hee had been so deluded. Therefore he went against these troups with great fury, meaning to take sharp vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much businesse, and long stay. All the Army was come, save only Eudamus, Captain of the Elephants, who, besides those beasts, had no more than four hundred horsemen in his company. Antigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent above two thousand horse, and all his light-armed foot-men, to cut it off by the way. Eudamus being fallen into this danger, was fain to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and so to defend himself as well as he could; for his horsemen, overlaied with multitudes, were quickly broken, and driven to run away upon the spurre. Neither knew they, who sate upon the Elephants, which way to turn them, for on all sides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremity there appeared brave troups of horse and foot, that came unexpected to the rescue, and charging the assailants upon the back, drave them to seek their own safety by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes, who though he knew not what his adversary meant to do, yet he knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himself, provided the remedy.

The conspiracie of Peucestes and others, against Eumenes his life.

BY these means Eumenes wonne great honour, and was by the whole Army acknowledged a most expert Generall; and well worthy of the chief command. But Peucestes, and the other Captains, guilty of their own much insufficiency, were so transported with envie, that they could no longer mantain their vile thoughts, but held communication, as upon a necessary point, how they might find means to murder him.

Surely, it is great injustice to impute the mischief contrived against worthy men, to their own proud carriage, or some other ill deserving: For, though it often happen, that small vices do serve to counterpoise great vertues; (the sense of evill being more quick and lasting than of good) yet he shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonie, will think it a part of wisedome, to find good reason of the evills done to vertuous men, which oftentimes have no other cause than vertue it self. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to be of singular courtesie, of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and carefull by all gentle means to win their love, that seemed to bear him any secret ill affection. It was his meer vertue that overthrew him, which even they that sought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that he should not be slain, before the battell were fought with Antigonus, wherein they confessed that it stood best with their safety, to be governed by his direction. Of this treason he was quickly advertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he used to borrow money when he needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for fear of losing their own. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himself of the villany intended against him, he made his last Will, and burnt all his Writings that contained any matter of secrecie: which done, he revolved many things in his mind; being doubtfull what course he were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royall bloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number than in worth. How things at that time stood in Macedon and Greece, either he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might incourage him to seek their help, that needed his. To make his own peace with Antigonus, had been against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that he forbare either to lose the battell willingly, or to flie into Cappadocia, and make shift for himself among his old friends. At length he resolved to do his best against the common enemy, and afterwards to look to himself as well as he might.

The last battell between Antigonus and Eumenes.

THE Souldiers, especially those old bands of the Silver-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victory, but onely to bring them into the field, and set them in array; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritie was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chief Commanders were so mischievously bent against him, that they could not endure to think of being beholding to him for the victory. Yet he ordered the battell so well, that, without their own great fault, they could hardly fail of getting the upper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice unto the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednes in fighting against their own Fathers, would now be punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vain. For the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seventy yeers old, and strengthened more by continuall exercise, than decayed by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to bee presented in that fight.

Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Ancient and best regarded of all all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very penſive, and advanced heavily, ſuſpecting their own cauſe, and fearing that the threatnings uttered would prove true.

Antigonus was now again far the ſtronger in horſe, which gave him cauſe of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plain levelled field. Placing therefore himſelf and his ſon Demetrius in the right wing, and committing the left wing to Python, he did ſet forward couragiouſly againſt the Enemies, that were ready to give him a ſharp entertainment.

Eumenes took unto him Peuceſtes, with the reſt of the Lords, and ſtood in the left wing of his battail, in the face of Antigonus; meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all means to make head againſt him on the ſudden; and (withall) to give proof of his own valour, which perhaps he ſhould no more doe, in the face of all his Enemies. In the right wing, oppoſite unto Python, he beſtowed the weakeſt of his horſe and Elephants, under one Philip, an honeſt man, and (which was enough at ſuch a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a reaſonable retrait, expecting the event of the other ſide.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himſelf maſter of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to win ſuch a victory upon his open enemies, as might give him leiſure and opportunity to deal with his falſe friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being even in their own opinions, far inferiour to thoſe whom they muſt encounter, were at the firſt brunt preſently defeated by the Silver-ſhields, who ſlew above five thouſand of them, loſing of their own not one man. But in Horſe, Eumenes was ſo over-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who preſſed him very hard, but was fain to ſtand wholly upon defence. Yet his courage wrought ſo well by example, among his followers, that the Enemy could not win one foot of ground upon him, untill ſuch time as Peuceſtes, with one thouſand five hundred Horſe, withdrew himſelf out of the battell, leaving his companions fighting, to defend his back.

Then did Eumenes deſperately ruſh amongſt his Enemies, labouring to break open the way unto Antigonus himſelf. And though he failed of his purpoſe, yet with great ſlaughter he did ſo beat upon them which came in his way, that the victory hung a long time in ſuſpence, uncertain which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a ſlight ſandie mould, through the tramping of horſes, men, and Elephants, did caſt up ſuch a cloud of duſt, as hindred the proſpect, ſo that no man could ſee what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, diſpatched away ſome companies of horſe, that paſſed undiſcovered beyond Eumenes his battails, and came to his carriages, which lay about half a mile from the place of fight, ſlenderly guarded, (for that the whole body of the Army lay between him and danger) and therefore eaſily taken. Had Peuceſtes retired himſelf no further than unto the carriages, he might not onely have defended them, but peradventure have ſurpriſed thoſe which came to ſurpriſe them, and ſo have done as good a piece of ſervice as a better man. But he was gotten ſomewhat further, to a place, where out of danger he might expect the event: and Eumenes was ſo over-laboured both in body and mind, that he could not poſſibly give an eye to every place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened ſo, that the Elephants meeting together, thoſe of Antigonus had the better hand; whereupon Eumenes, finding himſelf every way over-charged, began to give back, and withdrew himſelf and his companies in good order, to the other ſide of the battail, where Philip (as he was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from loſſe. The Antigonians had ſold ſo much of Eumenes that day, that they were well content to let him depart quietly, and wiſhed not to ſee him come again; as fain he would have done.

The loſſe of the carriages was reported unto him, as ſoon as he had any leiſure to hear how things went: whereupon he preſently ordered his men for a freſh charge, and ſent for Peuceſtes that was not far off, requeſting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby he truſted, not only to recover their own goods, but to enrich themſelves with the ſpoils of the enemies. Peuceſtes not onely refuſed to joyn with him, but immediately withdrew himſelf into a ſafer place, where he might be further from ſuch dangerous temptations.

By

By this the night grew on, and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to return into their Camps. Yet Antigonus conceived hope of doing somewhat more, and therefore taking half his horsemen, he waited upon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunity to offend him: the other half he committed to Pythus, willing him to set upon the Silver shields in their retrait; which yet he forbare to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battail ended; wherein Antigonus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in foot: but the spoil which he got, by surprising his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other losses.

How Eumenes was betrayed to Antigonus, and slain.

Eumenes, comming into his Camp, and finding the Silver shields extremely discontented with their misfortune, began to cheer them up, and put them in hope of recovering all with advantage. For their brave demeanour that day had so crushed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great wilderneſſe, over the high mountains.

But these perswasions availed nothing. Peucestes was gone, the other Captains would needs return into the high Countries; and the Souldiers had no desire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recover their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captains of the Silver shields, (who had in former times readily consented unto traiterous motions, in hope of gain, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himself great, and winning the love of those bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore unto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the onely reward of their services, in the wars of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also with little entreatie, perform a great deal more than they promised; and therefore he lovingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of far greater matter than they desired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make war against him. This answer pleased them so well, that they forthwith devised how to deliver him alive. Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to do their duties, and pretending more joy of their victory, than sorrow of their losse, which they said they would redeem by another fight; in the middest of this goodly talk, they leapt upon him, caught hold of his sword, and bound him fast. So they haled him away, and stopping their ears against all perswasions, would not yeeld so far, as to loosen one of his hands, and let him kill himself, but brought him alive (that was their own Generall, under whom they had obtained many victories) as it had been in triumph, into the Camp of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Camp to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was fain to send a guard of horse-men and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom he could not suddenly resolve, either to kill or save. Very few they were that sued for his life: but of these, Demetrius the son of Antigonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were saved, he would soon be the chief in reputation, for his great ability. So after long deliberation, Antigonus concluded that it was the safest way to put him to death; which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keep it a while in his own power, to reverse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to have him live his friend) haste of other businesse made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the travails of that worthy Generall Eumenes, who had with great wisdome, fidelity, and patience, laboured in vain to uphold the family which God had purposed to cast down. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutability, but more notable was his government of himself in all her changes. Adversity never lessened his courage, nor prosperity his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Army, without full power, to keep it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered by Gaspar de Coligny, Admiral of France in our daies, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soon after in the massacre sacre of Paris; That rather than to lead again an Army of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus himself gave to the body of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chief Captain of the Silver-shields he burnt alive; many of the other Captains he slew; and to the whole multitude of the Silver-shields, that had betraied so worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader that should carry them into far Countries, under pretence of wars; but with a privie charge, to consume them all, as perjured wretches, letting none of them return alive unto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas that beat upon the shores of Greece and Macedon.

§. VIII.

How Antigonus slew Python, and occupied Media. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himself Lord of Persia, carrying away Peucestes.

THe two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter: the common Souldier idly; the principall men intentively bent unto the businesse ensuing. Python began to consider his own deservings; for the whole war had been chiefly maintained by the strength and riches of his Province. Besides, he thought himself as good a man as Antigonus, unlesse it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged easie to be purchased with gifts, and therefore spared not to assay them with great liberality. But in following this course he was driven by necessity to trust many, of whom he stumbled upon some, that were unsecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose discovered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Python) dissembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers, as breeders of dissention between him, and his honourable friend, unto whom he meant to commit the Government of all those Countries; his own businesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming daily to his ears, did finely delude Python. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authority in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Governour; and the love of the Souldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintain, even an offensive war. But what need had he to use the sword, when he was likely without contention, to obtain more than he own asking? Therefore he came as soon as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such division. As soon as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slain out of hand. For Antigonus, having begun with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down indifferently all that stood in his way: but swam carelesly through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Governour in Media, to order the Province, and a Captain, to suppresse all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authority, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were derived.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he understood his own mightinesse. For he placed and displaced at his owvn pleasure, Governors in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his own creatures, except such as lay too far off to bee dislodged easily.

Peucestes, who ruled in Persia, thought with good cheer to redeem old offences, but was deceived, having to doe with one that could not be taken with such baits: hee was carried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that never after took effect. Thus he, that envied the vertue of his friend, was driven to flatter (in vain) the fortune of his enemie, after which he led a most contemptible life, till he died obscurely and forgotten.

How Seleucus was chased out of Babylon by Antigonus. The great riches of Antigonus.

SEleucus was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good will to Antigonus, and now gave proof of his hearty affection toward him, by making the Captain of the Castle of Susa to meet him on the way, rendring unto him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein bestowed. This offer was so great, that Antigonus (though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleeve it; but used him with excessive kindnesse, for fear so good a mood should change. In that Castle he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Jewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of mony, made up 25. thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himself a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which he aimed; therefore he proceeded, with intent to leave no Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Soveraign Lord. Comming to Babylon, he was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of love, and honoured with presents beseeming the Majesty of a King. All this he accepted with great gravity, as being due to him; and began to require an account of the revenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held unreasonable; saying, That it was not needfull for him to render unto any man an account of that Province, which was given unto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who urged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessity, moved Antigonus to presse him thus, but onely the desire to pick matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that he should find such issue, as Python and Peucestes had done. Therefore taking with him only fifty horse, he conveyed himself away, and fled into Ptolemies Dominions; desiring him to prouest him from such a man as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had been his betters, or at least his equalls. Antigonus was glad of his flight, for now all those Countries were yeelded unto him without battail, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them, he wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange Prophecie to Antigonus, bidding him look well to himself, and know, that if Seleucus did escape his hands, he should recover Babylon, yea, win all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battail. Easie beleevers may give credit to this tale. Had it been true, methinks, Antigonus rather should have hanged those Chaldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than sent pursuers (as they say that he did) after him, whom the destinies preserved for so great purposes. When he had setled things at Babylon, he took his journy into Cilicia, where he wintered. There he took up ten thousand talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yearly in-come to amount unto eleven thousand Talents.

CHAP. V.

Of the great War between ALEXANDERS Captains: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

§. I.

The combination of Ptolomy, Cassander, and others against Antigonus; their demands, and his answer.

THis great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, envied, and suspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomie, Cassander, and Lysimachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason than of his own accord he seemed like to yeeld unto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good good entertainment given unto Seleucus, giving him sufficient cause of mistrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them severally, entreating them to continue firm in their love toward him, that would be ready to requite them with the like. The cold answers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomy, it being likely that a good Army should prevail more than a fair message. Therefore, as soon as the season of the year would permit, he took the way toward Syria, & was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lords did much rejoyce at his victory, obtained against Eumenes their common enemy, and the honour that he had thereby gotten. In which war, forasmuch as they being his Confederates, must have endured great losse, with hazard of their whole Estates, if the contrary faction had prevailed; they held it very just, that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voyage, wherein they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they desired him, that making between them all an equall division of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchaces. This might best be to every ones liking, if he would make over Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering upon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus: for whereas his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victory, he might well spare some of those Western Provinces, to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomy, he would not crave any new addition, but rest contented within his own Territories. Provided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his own, out of which he had been driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly consent unto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtain with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many losses received, hee should yet be able to redeem peace whensoever he listed, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was hee so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for fear only, lest it should be taken from him perforce. Rather he hoped that he should be able to find them work, more than enough to defend their own. Therefore he roundly answered the Embassadours, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victory, which he alone without other mens help had obtained. Though indeed they had already sufficiently gained by him, if they could see it, having by his means kept their governments, whereof they were like to be dispossessed by Polisperchon, and the councell of estate in Macedon. But what marvell was it, if they considered not how he had saved them, seeing one of them had forgotten the time, when comming to him as a fugitive, and begging succour, he was by his meer bounty relieved, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those dayes command me to surrender Provinces, and give him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers sake) desired me to pitty him, and help him against his enemies: which I did; by lending him an army, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now presumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complain of wrong, that durst not stay to plead his right? I did use him well; but his conscience told him that he had deserved ill: else he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their own, which some of them can hardly justifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings, and after him to deal with others, if they continue to provoke me.

§. II.

The preparation and beginnings of the Wars.

WHen the Embassadours were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought upon but Warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should be invaded from Europe, as soon as he was entred into Syria, left his Nephew Ptolomy to guard the Sea-coast, and hinder Cassander from landing in Asia: giving him also charge, to drive out of Cappadocia some that were already sent over to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cyprus, not unfurnished of money; to draw friends to his side, and raise up troubles to his enemies. Especially, he laboured to make himself the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreslowed his journy into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which afforded many excellent cōmodities for building of a Navie. Therfore, having erected Beacons, & laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, he invaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintain the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloved and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Provinces he kept with a few Garrisons, better serving to contain the people within obedience, than to confront a forreign enemy. So Antigonus took many Cities and Places of that Country, and began to set great numbers of Artificers on work in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a year and three moneths; not idly. For hee took Joppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded unto his discretion, and well used. The strong City of Tyrus held out long, but was compelled in the end by famine, to render it self upon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomy was not asleep, whilest these things were in doing, though he kept himself within the bounds of Egypt, as indeed it behooved him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plain field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Nevertheless by Sea (where his enemy was as yet unready) he sent his Fleet into all quarters, whereof Seleucus had the chief command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred sail along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Army, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which was then governed by many petty Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomy, the rest were by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharp steel.

The same commodity of aid by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also Cassander, but not the son of Antipater, howsoever by the painfull and learned writer Reinerus Reineccius, he is, by some oversight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomy and his Confederates, and busily employ in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutrality, and thereby enjoyed rest; but now he threw himself into dangerous war, choosing rather to undergoe trouble at hand, than to fall under certain ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

§. III.

How each party sought to win the assistance of Greece. Antigonus his declaration against Cassander. Alexander the son of Polysperchon revolteth from Antigonus who had set him up.

IN the mean season all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure unto them the people of Greece, whose aid, which way soever inclined, was of great importance. Herein at the first, Antigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that he drew to him the Lacedæmonians, and other Peloponnesians, of whom he waged eight thousand, and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowse himself again, and taking upon him the title of Captain of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopefull beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kind. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, he called together both his own Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to be found thereabouts. To these he declared, that Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, mother to the great Alexander, and not herewith contented, had shut up in close prison the poor Lady Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her body. That all this proceeded from a desire to make himself King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Lady Thessalonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match unfit for a man of no greater parentage than he, to joyn with him in marriage. That in meer despight of those dead Princes, Philip and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new City by him built, and called by his own name Cassandria; and had re-edified the City of Thebes, which for the great treason of the Inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons he required them to make a decree, that Cassander should restore to absolute liberty the Lady Roxane, and her son; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire, (by which name Antigonus himself was understood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece should be restored into freedome: this hee did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the need which he had of their assistance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not onely the Greeks would adhere unto him, as to their loving Patron, and fall off from Cassander; but that the rulers of Provinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing but his own benefit, would correct their opinion, and think him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall blood. But concerning his loyalty to the young Prince, the world was too wise to be deceived with vain shews. His undertaking for the liberty of the Greeks was more effectuall, and got easie belief, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolemie strove to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to win to himself that valiant Nation, which afforded men far more serviceable in war, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire.

And this indeed was the point at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all sure, deceived himself, not without great cost. For he gave to Alexander the son of Polysperchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the war on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appear, that on his side was meant nothing else, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponnesus, Cassanders men had with much bloud-shed, grievously afflicted the contrary faction, and he himself perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemies, than retained as friends, thought it the best way to make what use he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiving that Alexander came furnished with plentie of gold, wherewith he was able, not onely to win the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seem best assured; he thought it a part of wisedome, to surrender upon fair conditions, that which he could not assure himself to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deal with Alexander about the matters in controversie, telling him, that Antigonus was very skilfull in setting men together by the ears, not caring who prevailed, but only desiring to have them weary themselves, whilest he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might find opportunity to set upon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keep in his purse the five hundred talents which he had, and without stroke striken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponnesus, it should be freely put into his hands by Cassander; Provided, that he should from thenceforth renounce all confederacy made with Antigonus, and enter into a sure and faithfull league with Ptolomy, Cassander, and the rest of the Confederates. Otherwise he might well perswade himself, that the Country which his Father could not keep, when he was indeed the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be won by him, that was onely the Factor of a proud injurious man, so stiling himself, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus since the begining of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discover the intent, (which he did not carry very secret) of making himself absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soon entreated to accept so good an offer, and did not stick to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject unto no mans controll.

Howbeit, this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life together, by treason of the Sicyonians, who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soon after vanquished in battail by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Lady. She in revenge of her husbands death, crucified thirty of the Citizens taken in fight, and having by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards continue her Army in good order, and governed those places that she held, with the commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

§. IIII.

The Ætolians rise against Cassander in favour of Antigonus, and are beaten. A fleet and land-army of Antigonus utterly defeated by Ptolomies Lieutenant. In what termes the war stood at this time. Antigonus draws neerer to Greece.

Antigonus, when he found, that with so much money he had only bought an enemy, began to raise troubles to Cassander and his other adversaries in Greece, by stirring up the Æolians against them: Likewise he laboured to win to his party the Ilands in the Greek Seas, by whose assistance he might be the better able to deal with Ptolomy, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong Fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Æolians, a factious Nation, and alwaies envying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but so, that commonly their gains equalled not their losses. Cassander won some of their own Country, fortified the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Clanetas, King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquished in battail, to forsake their side, and bind himself to bear Armes against Cassander's friends.

On the other side, as many petty Ilands were drawn to joyn with Antigonus: so the Fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admirall to Antigonus, passing along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Army under conduct of Peridiccas marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite overthrown by Ptolomies Navie. Polychyus, who in Ptolomies behalf had been sent into Peloponnesus against Alexander, finding no need of his service in that Country, because Alexander was come over to their side, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprised. He rode with his Fleet behind a Cape, which the enemies were to double, his Land forces he placed in ambush, wherein Peridiccas falling was taken prisoner, with many of his men, and many were slain, making little resistance. Theodatus the Admirall perceiving this, made all haste to help his fellows that were on Land; but whilest he with all his Fleet were intentive onely to that businesse, Polychyus appeared at their backs, who as soon as he perceived their disorder, hastened about the Cape, and charging them behind, suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings caused Antigonus to deal with Ptolomy about some composition. First, he sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld unto the demands of Ptolomy: so the parley was vain.

Hitherto each part seemed to have indifferently sped in the war, and thereby to have equall cause of hope and fear. This late victory, with the good successe of his affairs in Cyprus, did seem to make amends to Ptolomy for his losses in Syria. Likewise the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equall the confederacy made between the Æolians and him; as also those petty skirmishes, that had been in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his advantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but adverse to him, and by the troubles brought upon his estates in those parts by the two Cassanders.

Contrariwise, Antigonus valued the losse of his men, mony, and ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his nails, that were left long enough, and would easily grow again, but the enlargement of his Territory by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed upon a limb of Ptolomy his enemy, and strengthened the body of his own Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want no mony.

That which most molested him, was the attempts of his enemies upon Asia the lesse; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to fear, lest the people, being tied unto him by no bond of allegeance, might upon small occasion revolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himself. To prevent this, and to be neerer to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affairs did seem to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Army in Syria under his son Demetrius, to whom, being then but two and twenty yeers old, he appointed many ancient Captains as assistants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

§. V. How

§. V.

How Lysimachus and Cassander vanquished Soter enemies, raised against them by Antigonus. The good successe of Antigonus in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against Cassander.

THe comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the processe of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leisure to think upon molesting him in Asia; they themselves were held over hardly to their own work on Europe side. Seuthes a King of the Thracians, joyning with some Townes that rebelled against Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relied upon Antigonus, who was to help them with money and victuall. The Aetolians likewise took courage, and rose against Cassander, having Æacides lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gave unto his Rebells no time to confirm themselves. He suddenly presented himself before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by fear to return unto their former duty. Hee fought a battell with the Scythians, and wilde Thracians, and drave them out of the Country. Finally, hee overcame Seuthes, and following the heat of his victory, slew Ptolemie in battell, whom Antigonus had sent over with an Armie; and all his men he did either put to ransome, or fill up with them his own Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Aetolians. For hee wasted their Countrey, fought with the Epirotes, that came to help them: and after the victory, fought again with their forces joyned in one, overthrowing them, and killing Æacides that unfortunate King. Finally, he drave the Aetolians out of most of their Country, and forced them to seek their safety among the wilde Mountains. Of the Epirotes, hee sent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present War.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonus his adversaries with painfull travell; after which they remained onely lavers. Antigonus himself at faire leisure wan all Caria the whilest, and sent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing liberty upon all the Cities hee took out of Cassanders bands. The whole Country of Peloponnesus (excepting Sicyon and Corinth) with the Isle of Euboea, and many places of the firm Land, were by those means won to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to doe or suffer any thing for him that had made so evident a demonstration of his readinesse, to give them the liberty indeed, which others had promised in idle words. Many States desirous of the same benefit, would faln have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Cassanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them loose. Therefore Antigonus made shew as if hee would passe over into Macedon: by which terrour he forced Cassander to repair thither in all haste, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Towns of Greece so weakly guarded, that well they might take courage to help themselves, if any forreign succour appeared. The aid which they desired was not long wanting. The Lieutenant of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Cassanders departure, entred the Country, drave his Garrisons out of divers Cities, forced the Governour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord, wanne the Cittadell of Thebes, and set the people at liberty. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before been raised out of her old ruines by the meer power of Cassander, of which act hee was accused by Antigonus, as if it had been some hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the City, and the love of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thank the Increaser, than the Author of their good, and rather to look forward upon those hopes, which vainly they extend beyond all measure, than backward upon their miserable nullity, that held them uncapable of being any thing.

§. VI.

Victories of Ptolomy by Sea. A great battell at Gaza, which Ptolomy and Seleucus won, against Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus.

AS the presence or neernesse of Antigonus gave life to his affairs in the lower Asia and Greece; so the designes of his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Eastern parts, wherewith in the year preceding he had over-topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wavered between contrary affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their covenant with Ptolomy, was visited by an Egyptian Fleet, wherewith Ptolomy, in his own person easily reduced them to a more setled order, putting some to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own appointment, Governour of the whole Country. With the same Fleet he ran alongst the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned loaden to Cyprus. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horses and light-armed Foot with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vain did hee tire himself and his followers, in hasty seeking of one, that by launching out into the deep, could in a few minutes delude the labour of so many dayes, if need had so required. Answerable to the vanity of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomy was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilicia. Neither was it certain, whether having lightned his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would return upon those maritime Countries, or make towards Syria, where his comming was expected. He was indeed gone into Egypt, and there with Seleucus was describing a Royall Army, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recovery of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therefore he was fain to choose out of uncertainties the most likelihood, and return the way that he came, with all his companies, which were fitter for service in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrisons among the Cilicians. Hee had scarce refreshed his men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomie's comming with a puissant Army, to give him battell. Hereupon he called to counsell his principall friends, who advised him to give way to the time, and expect some better opportunity in the future, being a young man, and weakly furnished with means to resist such ancient and famous Generalls, as Ptolomy and Seleucus. This counsell seemed rather to proceed from the cold temper of those aged men that gave it, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himself to be the son of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Army, thought his own title weightie enough to be laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found hee much reason that should move him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himself, that such oddes of number, and of great fame, would rather serve to adorn his victory, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Souldiers with hope of spoil and rewards, hee abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpose to encounter them, as soon as they had finished their wearisome journey over the Desarts of Arabia.

Ptolomie and Seleucus issuing out of so rich a Province as Egypt, came so well provided of all necessaries, that their Army felt not any great grievance of the evill way, when battell was presented them, which confidently they undertook. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were utterly unprovided. But how to deal with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had prepared a kind of Palisado, fastened strongly together with chains, and sharpened in such a manner, that the Elephants could not seek to break upon it, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces (which (besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate services, by them performed that year, whilest the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vain journeys, or long and dulling expectation,) they disposed in such order, as best answered to the form, wherein Demetrius was embattelled. The fight began, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time; each part striving striving more to win honour, than to satisfie any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the errour of Demetrius, who upon no necessity would needs fight a battell with disadvantage, began to appear by his losses. He had committed himself to Fortune, having more to lose by her than he could get: but in this fight shee was idle, and left all to be decided by strong hands; unlesse it may be said, that the terrour brought upon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kind of warre hardly to bee resisted on plain ground; and therefore at the first they made great spoil amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to break through the Palisado, they were sorely hurt, and every one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horse-men of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little, till now perceiving that all must lye upon their hands, who were ill able to make their own places good, they began to shrink, and many of them to provide for their safety by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had stroven so long in vain to make his men abide, that he himself was likely to be lost; he was fain to give place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as far as to Azotus, which was about thirty miles from the place of battell. A great part of his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to save such goods, as in haste they could pack up. This foolish covetousnesse was their destruction, and the losse of the Town. For whilest they, forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter-Horses, and cloyed up the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch; others, to carry out what they had already loaden, Ptolomies Army brake in without resistance, taking them with their goods and the City altogether.

This victory restored unto Ptolomy the best part of Syria, a Province more easie in those times to get, than to keep; and opened the way unto all the greatnesse of Seleucus. For between Gaza and Phœnicia no place offered resistance. In Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, some Towns held out a while, but were soon taken in by Ptolomy. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon, of which Sidon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutiny against their Captain, who trusting to the strength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomy, and honourably entertained in respect of his fidelity.

How Seleucus recovered Babylon, and made himself Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The Æra of the Kingdome of the Greeks, which began with the Dominion of Seleucus.

WHile Ptolomy followed his businesse with such prosperity, Seleucus took leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to try his own fortune; which he found so favourable, that recovering first his own Province, he became at length master of the better part of Alexanders purchases.

This expedition of Seleucus was very strange, and full of unlikelihoods. His train consisted of no more than eighteen hundred foot, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those main great Cities, against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that already stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the wals. The name of Seleucus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Governour, that none of them would find courage to resist him; but left that work to Antigonus his own men, wishing them ill to speed. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Ensignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and submitted themselves joyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Towns of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies in his own lodging. It remained that they should issue forth into the field, and try the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemy, with more than a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismayed the rest,

that they did no more adventure to seek to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his security in those quarters. This Castle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leisure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly took it, and so got the entire possession of Mesopotamia and Babylon, which Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Provinces, that were the utmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his own great Army lay between them and all enemies. Therefore when the victory at Gaza had opened unto Seleucus the way into those parts, hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. Having now gotten what he sought, it behoved him to seek how he might keep his gettings: for his own forces were too small, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not do for him, his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Army in Media, joyning unto himself, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull helps came, with ten thousand Foot, and seven thousand Horse, either to save all from being lost, or to drive Seleucus out of that which he had won.

Against this power, Seleucus had onely four hundred Horse, and somewhat above three thousand Foot, wherewith to oppose himself: his large Conquest of unwarlike Nations having yeelded him many loving Subjects, but few Souldiers. Therefore when his enemies were neer to the River of Tigris, he withdrew himself from the place where his resistance was expected, into certain marishes not farre off; where hee lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that he had been fled, and was the lesse carefull in fortifying his Camp. In recompence of this vain security, his Camp was taken by surprise, the first night of his arrival; the Satrapa, or Lieutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captains, were slain; hee himself was driven to flee for his life into the deserts, and the whole Army yeelded unto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victory, drew all Media, Susiana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victory of Seleucus gave beginning unto the new stile, of The Kingdome of the Greeks, an accompt much used by the Jewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first year of this Æra. The authority of that great Astrologer Ptolomy, from which there is no appeal, makes it plain, that the five hundred and nineteenth year of Nabonassar, was the fourscore and second year of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is needlesse, than that note of the learned Gauricus, That the first of these years was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four hundred thirty and eight years after Nabonassar. With the observation of the Saturn, recorded by Ptolomy, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to have been so placed in the sign of Virgo, as the Chaldeans had observed it, in the same year; which was from Nabonassar the five hundred and nineteenth, from Seleucus the fourscore & second year, and the last of the hundred thirty and seventh Olympiad. These observations of the celestiall bodies, are the surest marks of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences in History, and the years of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of unremembred fractions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these years of the Greeks were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainly appears in the difference of one year, that is found between actions, related by the severall Authors of the two Books of the Macchabees, who follow divers accompts. He that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomy, may apply the other supputations thereunto, as being no farther from it, than a years distance.

§. VIII.

How Ptolomy lost all he won in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience performed unto the Macedonians, by those that had been subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers petty enterprizes, taken in hand by Antigonus and Demetrius, with ill successe.

IN a happy hour did Seleucus adventure to goe up to Babylon, with so few men as his friend could then well spare: for had he staied longer upon hope of getting more Souldiers, Ptolomy could have spared him none at all. Demetrius the son of Antigonus, having lost the battail at Gaza, received from Ptolomy all his own goods, his Pages, and Servants, in free gift, and therewithall a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this War, which he and his Confedrates held with Antigonus; but only termes of honour, wherein they would seek to right themselves after such maner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomy, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him with some as brave liberality. Which to effect, he gathered together the remainder of his broken troops; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertising his Father of his misfortune, besought him to send a new supply, wherewith he might redeem his honour lost. Antigonus upon the first news of this overthrow, had said, That the victory which Ptolomy won upon a beardlesse Boy, should be taken from him by bearded men: yet upon desire that his son, whom he tenderly loved, should amend his own reputation, he was content to make a stand in Phrygia. Ptolomy hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did nevertheless follow his own businesse in Coelosyria, thinking it enough to spend part of his Army under Cilles his Lieutenant, against the remnant of those, that had been already vanquished, when Cilles too much undervalued the power of such an Enemy. Hee thought that this young Gallant, having lately saved his life by flight, would now bee more carefull of having a fair way at his back, than adventurous in setting further forward, than urgent reason should provoke him. In this confidence he passed on without all fear; as one that were already Master of the field, and should meet with none, that would issue out of their places of strength, to make resistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careless march; he took the lightest of his Army, and made his journey with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, he came upon Cilles unexpected, and was on the suddain, without any battail, Master of his Camp: taking him alive, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once.

This exploit served not only to repair the credit of Demetrius, which his losse at Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bounty of Ptolomy, with equall favour, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich presents. But neither was Ptolomy so weakned by this losse, nor Demetrius so emboldned by his victory, that any matter of consequence thereupon ensued. For Demetrius feared the comming of Ptolomy, and therfore he fortified himself in places of advantage: Ptolomy on the other side was loth to engage himself in an enterprise, wherein he might perceive, that if the comming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either be driven to make a shamefull retrait, or a dangerous adventure of his whole estate, in hope of not much more than already he possessed.

Antigonus, indeed, was nothing slow in his way towards Syria; whither hee made all haste, not so much to relieve his son, as to embrace him. For he rejoyced exceedingly, that the young man had so well acquitted himself, and being left to his own advice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victory, he brought such forces, as might serve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all should be referred unto the good foundation laied by his son; whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolomy had now lesse reason to encounter with Antigonus, than before his comming to have assailed the Camp of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of consultation; as if he

he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captains advised him to retire into Egypt, alleging many good arguments to that purpose: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his own intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdiccas, in the like defensive war. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any suddain passion of fear: and he departed at fair leisure, not onely carrying his treasures along with him, but staying to dismantle some principal Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Country that he left at his back, fell presently to Antigonus, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: so easie was it in those times, for the Captain of a strong Army, to make himself Lord of a great Province.

We may justly wonder, that these Kingdoms of Syria, Media, Babylon, and many other Nations, (which the victory of Alexander had over-run with so hasty a course, as gave him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himself, but by the Captains of his Army after him. The hot contentions for superiority between the King of Israel, and those of Damascus; between Egypt, and Babylon; Babylon and Nineve; the Persians and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once been in those people; which are now so patient of a forraign yoke, that like Sheep or Oxen, they suffer themselves to be distributed, fought for, won, lost, and again recovered by contentious Masters; as if they had no title to their own heads, but were born to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appear the more strange, if we shall consider, how the severall States of Greece (many of which had never possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their spirits to swell beyond their ability) did greedily embrace all occasions of liberty: and how these proud Conquerours were glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather friends than servants, for fear of further inconvenience.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries had alwaies been subject unto the rule of Kings, or petty Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long since had rooted out, and held them in such bondage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraign Masters. This had utterly taken from them all remembrance of home-born Princes, and incorporated them into the great body of the Persian Empire: so that wanting within themselves all soveraign power, or high authority, the life and spirit of every Estate; they lay as dead, and were bereaved of motion, when that Kingdom fell, whereof they lately had been members.

Why the Persian Satrapa, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Darius was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captains, after the death of Alexander, strive to lay hold upon those Provinces, which had many ages bin subject unto them, and scarce four years in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossesse them of their new purchases: it is a question wherein, who is not satisfied, may find no lesse reason to suspect the History, than authority to confirm it. For we seldome read, that any small Kingdom, prevailing against a far greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compasse of ten years, as left unto the vanquished no hope of recovery, nor means to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather utter confusion hath ensued, by the fury of civill war among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set down by Machiavell; and concerns all other Kingdoms, that are subject unto the like form of Government: the sum whereof is this; Whersoever the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of slaves, there is the conquest easie, and soon assured: Where ancient Nobility is had in due regard, there is it hard to win all, and harder to keep that which is won. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any invader should prevail so far upon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for Brethren he useth not to suffer alive) were taken or slain: the whole Empire would quickly bee wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassaes, how great soeuer they may seem, are meer slaves, neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personall regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, wherein hope of private gain should not countervail countervail all apparent matter of fear. Contrariwiſe, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conqueſt, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though he further got the better part of the Country, and were by farre the ſtrongeſt in the field. For, beſides the Princes of the Royall bloud, there are in that Kingdom ſtore of great men, who are mighty in their ſeverall Countries, and having certain Royalties and Principalities of their own, are able to raiſe Warre in all quarters of the Realm; whereunto the remembrance of their own ancient Families, and long continued Nobility, will alwayes ſtirre up and inflame them: ſo that untill every one piece were won, and every one (an endleſſe work) of the chief Nobility brought under or deſtroyed, the victory were not compleat, nor well aſſured. It is true, that ſuch power of the Nobility, doth often-times make way for an Invader; to whom the diſcontentments of a few can eaſily make a fair entrance. But ſuch aſſiſtants are not ſo eaſily kept, as they are gotten; for they look to be ſatisfied at full, in all their demands; and having what they would, they ſoon return to their old allegeance, upon condition to keep what they have, unleſſe they be daily hired with new rewards: wherein it is hard to pleaſe one man, without offending another as good as himſelf. The Turk, on the other ſide, needs not to fear any peril, that might ariſe from the diſcontented ſpirits of his principall men. The greateſt miſchief that any of them could work againſt him, were the betraying of ſome frontier Town, or the wilfull loſſe of a battail: which done, the Traitor hath ſpent his ſting, and muſt either fly to the enemy, whereby he loſeth all that hee formerly did hold; or elſe, in hope of doing ſome further harm, he muſt adventure to excuſe himſelf unto his Maſter, who ſeldome forgives the Captain, that hath not ſtrived by deſperate valour againſt misfortune. As for making head, or arming their followers againſt the great Sultan, and ſo joyning themſelves unto any Invader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than ſuch as are ſubject unto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commiſſions. Now as this baſe condition of the principall men, doth leave unto them no means, whereby to oppoſe themſelves againſt the flouriſhing eſtate of their Prince; ſo would it weaken both their power and their courage in giving him aſſiſtance, if adverſity ſhould make him ſtand in need of them. For there is ſcarce any one among the Turks Baſſaes, or Provinciall Governours, that knows either from whence he was brought, or from whom deſcended, nor any one among them, that by the loſſe and utter ruin of the Turkiſh Empire, can loſe any foot of his proper inheritance; and it is the proper inheritance of the ſubject, which is alſo a Kingdom unto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart againſt the Conquerer, who hath no other device painted on his Enſigne, than the picture of ſlavery.

As in the Turkiſh Empire, ſo was the Perſian, void of liberty in the Subjects, and utterly deſtitute of other Nobility, than ſuch as depended upon meer favour of the Prince. Some indeed there were of the Royall bloud, and others, deſcended from the Princes that joyned with Darius, the Son of Hyſtaſpes, in oppreſſing the Magi; theſe were men of reputation in Perſia, but their reputation conſiſted onely in their Pedigree, and their ſafety in not medling with affaires of State, which made them little eſteemed. In what ſmall account theſe Perſian Princes were held, it may appear by this, that the Kings Uncles, Couſin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and ſo did ſtile themſelves, in ſpeaking unto theſe great Monarchs. That upon every light occaſion of diſpleaſure they were handled as Slaves, it is eaſie to bee diſcerned, in that example of cruelty, practiſed by Xerxes upon his own brother Maſiſtes, which hath been formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapa, or Governours of the Provinces, it is needleſſe to cite examples, proving them to have been meer ſlaves: it may ſuffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of thoſe Women and Eunuchs, by whom the King was governed.

To this want of Nobility in Perſia, may be added the generall want of liberty convenient among the people: a matter no leſſe available, in making eaſie and ſure the conqueſt of a Nation, than is the cauſe aſſigned by Machiavell. For as Æſope his Aſſe did not care to run from the enemies, becauſe it was not poſſible, that they ſhould load him with heavier burthens, than his Maſter cauſed him daily to bear: ſo the Nations, that endure the worſt under their own Princes, are not greatly fearfull of a forraign yoke;

Nor

Nor will be hasty to shake it off, if by experience they find it more light, than was that whereunto they had been long accustomed. This was it that made the Gascoignes bear such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildely than the French: this enlarged the Venetian jurisdiction in Lombardy; for the Towns that they wan, they wan out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors: & this did cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had been subject unto the posterity of Alexanders followers, to serve the Romans patiently, if not willingly; for that by them they were eased of many burthens, which had been imposed upon them by their own Kings.

So that of this tamenesse, which we find in those that had been subjects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could not so easily be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeed been absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Bactrians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering upon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Army; thinking therewith to bring them under, or rather to get a rich booty. The Captains that he sent, fell upon the Nabathæans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart; wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Mirrh, Frankincense, & other such commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with five hundred talents of silver, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold upon: for their comming was sudden & unexpected. But ere they could recover Syria, the Nabathæans overtook them, & finding them weary with long marches, made such a slaughter, that of four thousand foot, and six hundred horse, onely fifty horse escaped. To revenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a great power: yet all in vain; for he was not resisted by any Army, but by the naturall defence of a vaste Wildernesse, lack of water, and of all things necessary. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein hee lost not much honour: for they craved it, and gave him presents. Returning from the Nabathæans, he viewed the Lake Asphaltites; whence hee conceived hope of great profit that might bee raised, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandry of his son, Antigonus was well pleased, and appointed men to the work: but they were slain by the Arabians, and so that hope vanished.

These petty enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good advantage against Ptolomy: when the news of Seleucus his victories in the high Countries, marred all together. For neither was the losse of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it safe to transport the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should have been exposed to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius with fifteen thousand foot, and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Antigonus did nothing, and his son did lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Lieutenants about Babylon withdrew themselves from necessity of fight; some places they fortified and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men than hee could spare, neither did he get much; and therefore was fain to set out the bravery of his expedition, by burning and spoiling the Country; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong unto his enemy, who thenceforth held it as his own assured.

Antigonus had laid upon his son a peremptory commandement, to return unto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seem) that in such an unsettled state of things, either the Warre might be ended, by the fury of the first brunt; or else it would be vain to strive against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that by strength of time was like to become lesse terrible to the Enemy. Demetrius therefore leaving behind him five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himself with greater forces could do little more than nothing, forsook the enterprise, and went back to his Father.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the house of Alexander was destroyed.

THese ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselves with uneffectuall travell, in seeking to get more than any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred, but meer desire of Empire, had moved them to enter into the war; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but only a dulnesse growing upon the slow advancement of their severall hopes, that made them willing to breathe awhile, till occasion might better serve to fight again.

Besides that main point, Of retaining the Provinces which every man held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gave a fair, but a false colour, to the businesse; That the son of Alexander by Roxane, should be made King when he came to full age; and, That all the Estates of Greece should be set at liberty. The advancement of young Alexander to his Fathers kingdome, seems to have been a matter forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to made himself Lord of all. But this, indeed, more neerly touched Cassander. For in his custodie was the young Prince and his Mother: neither did he keep them in a sort answerable to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seen the old Queen Olympias taken and murdered, that sought to put them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and fear between them, rooted in these grounds, of injuries done, and revenge expected; upon this conclusion of peace, grew up faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turn their favourable expectation, towards the son of their late renowned King.

All this either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The young Prince must first have possession of Macedon: whereby Cassander should be reduced to his poor office, of Captain over a thousand men, if not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either do as they had done under Aridæus; or better, as being better acquainted with their own strength. He in the mean time, by his readinesse to acknowledge the true Heir, had freed himself from that ill-favoured imputation, of seeking to make himself Lord of all that Alexander had gotten.

The like advantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greeks to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto been the subject of much idle discourse; but it never took effect. Antigonus held scarce any Town of theirs, Cassander occupied most of the Countrie: which if he should set free, he must be a poor Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the mean season, the Countries lying between Euphrates and the Greek seat, together with a great Armie, and money enough to entertain a greater, might serve to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes as high as ever they had been.

With much disadvantage doe many men contend against one that is equall to them all in puissance. Cassander's friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where every one mans help is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his own peace, but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are weary. The best was, that he knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becomming Subjects unto any man, much lesse to the son of an Asiatique woman, of whom they had long since refused to hear mention. Therefore he took a short course, and caused both the child and his Mother to be slain: freeing thereby himself in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yeelding up his government, which he must have done when the child had come to age. Roxane was a Lady of singular beautie, which was perhaps the cause why Perdiccas desired to have her son, being as yet unborn, proclaimed Heir to the great Alexander. Immediatly upon the death of Alexander, she had used the favour (if it were not love) of Perdiccas to the satisfying of her own bloudy malice, upon Statira, the Daughter of King Darius, whom Alexander had likewise married, according to the custome of those Countries, wherein plurality of wives is held no crime. For, having by a counterfeit Letter, in Alexanders name, gotten his poor Lady into her hands, shee did, by assistance of Perdiccas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled up with earth. But now, by Gods just vengeance, were she and her son made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time as the neer approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, after a wearisome imprisonment, grow deerer unto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing unto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords of all that they had under them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein every one perswaded himself of successe, rather better than worse. Hereupon all of them (except Lysimachus and Seleucus, that had work enough at home) began to rowze themselves: as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his own stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were busie in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: while their Master was carefull in following other, and some greater matters that were more secretly to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument minister unto Ptolomy matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Towns, which ought, in fair dealing, to be set at liberty. Under colour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Army into Cilicia, where he won four Towns, and soon after lost them, without much labour of his own or his enemies.

After this, putting to sea with a strong Fleet, he ran along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voyage allured unto him a nephew of Antigonus (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his services) whom finding shortly, as false to himself as he had been to his own Uncle, he was fain to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greeks at libertie, appeared not so plain, as hee wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered by his molesting Antigonus in Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, he made at the last an expedition into Greece it self: where having set free some little Ilands, and landed in Peloponnesus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long-desired work, that Cratesipole, the Widow of Alexander, Polysperchons son, gave up into his hands the Towns of Sycion and Corinth.

Ptolomie had conceived a vain belief, that the Greeks, emboldened by his countenance and assistance, would all of them take heart and rise up in arms; whereby with little labour their libertie might be gotten, and he be acknowledged as Author of this immortall benefit. But long servitude had well-neer extinguished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recover freedome, had so tired their spirits, that they would no more stir in pursuit thereof; but sate idly still, as wishing it to fall into their mouthes.

The Lacedæmonians, about these times, began to fortifie their Town with walls, trusting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that upheld it, were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Town and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble servants, as they had been in times past insolent Masters: erecting as many statuaes in honour of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were daies in the year. This Demetrius was now their Governour, and he governed them with much moderation: but in spight of their hearts, as being set over them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is easie to gather, how the rest of the Country stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them to set their helping hands to their own good, and to furnish him with the promised supplies of mony and victuals. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thraldome; as judging the commoditie that would arise by annexing them to his partie, a matter of more weight than the losse that Cassander should receive thereby, who could hardly retain them, if once Antigonus took the work in hand. But when he found such difficultie in the businesse, hee changed his purpose: and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sicyon and Corinth in his own possession.

Before the comming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassander had been held occupied with very much work. For (besides his pains taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found means to allure unto himself the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponnesus, and about Hellespont: making his own advantage of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice hee freed himself from a greater danger, and made those murthers which he had committed seem the lesse odious, by teaching his enemies to doe the like. Old Polysperchon, that had made so great a stir in the reign of Aridæus, did after the death of Roxane and her child, enter again upon the Stage: leading in his hand another son of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this young Prince was Hercules: he was begotten on Barsine the daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had been lesse esteemed than the son of Roxane, either for that his Mother was held no better than a Concubine, or else perhaps, in regard of the favour which Perdiccas, and after him Olympias, did bear unto Roxane. At this time the death of his brother had moved such compassion and regard of his being Alexanders onely living child, had procured unto him such good will, that the demand which Polysperchon made in his behalf, was deemed very just and honourable. There were indeed more hearts than hands, that joyned with this young Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not been most false. Cassander had raised an Armie to withstand his entrie into Macedon: but little trust could he repose in that Armie, whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercules. Therefore he allured Polysperchon himself with gifts and promises, wherewith at length he prevailed so far, that the old Villain was contented to murder his Popill; choosing rather with many curses and foul dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnesus, and Commander of an Armie, than to purchase a noble fame with dangerous travell, in maintaining his faith, unto both his dead and living Soveraigns.

Antigonus had not all this while bin asleep; though his losses were hitherto the chief witnesses of his having been a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present to retain his own: and therefore took order for the recoverie of those places which Ptolomie had taken pains to win. As for the rest, it no way grieved him to see Cassander incur the generall hatred of men by committing those murders of which the profit was like to redound unto him that was the most powerfull, or to see Polysperchon and Ptolomie sweat in a busie war against Cassander. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have afforded them leasure, and have thought the time well spent in beholding their contentions. For he was throughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselves in vain with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all under. According to these haughtie conceits, he demeaned himself among his followers; looking big upon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them to revolt from him: but it was no great losse to be forsaken by those that looked with envious eyes upon that fortune whereon their own should have depended. Against this envie of his men, and the malice of others, Antigonus busily sought a remedie, such as was like to give him a goodly stile to the whole Empire.

Cleopatra, Sister unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes: whom he had a great desire to take to wife. This his desire was not without good hope: for howsoever she discovered much unwillingnesse thereunto, yet was she in his power, and might therefore be entreated, were it only for fear of being enforced. But it was not his purpose to get her by compulsive means: either because his fancie, being an old man, was not over-violent; or rather because his ambition, whereunto all his affections had reference, could have made small use of her, by doing such apparent wrong. She had been married unto Alexander King of Epirus, after whose death she came to her brother in Asia, hoping belike to find a new husband in his Camp. But neither any of those brave Captains, that were, in times following, so hot in love with her, durst then aspire unto her marriage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himself with providing her of an husband. She therefore, being a lustie widow, suffered her bloud so far to prevail against her honour, that she supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Paramours. Alexander hearing of this, turned it to a jest: saying, That she was his sister, and must be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death the Empire lay in a manner void, and the portion due to her therein grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had been: then did many seek to obtaine her, while shee her selfe desired only a proper man, with whom shee might lead a merry life. To this purpose did she invite Leonnatus unto her; who made great haste, but was cut off by death ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, she had her choice of all the great Commanders: Antigonus, Ptolomie, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her earnest wooers. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wives already; Ptolomie had many wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kind. This hindred not his suite: peradventure it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her self, and was taking her journy from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citie, made her to stay, untill his Masters further pleasure should be known. Antigonus had now a Wolf by the ears: he neither could well hold her, nor durst let her goe. She would not be his wife; he had no honest pretence to force her; and to keep her prisoner, had bin the way, by which he might have incurred a generall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassander against Roxane (a Ladie lesse respected than Alexanders own sister) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wisest way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commodity of so fair a title to the kingdom, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Governour of Sardes, willing him in any ease to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certain women about her put in trust with the murder: which women afterwards were put to death, as mischievous conspirers against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least in his own opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murther was detected, we need not aske: for seldome is that bloudie crime unrevealed, and never so ill smothered, as when great persons are the Authors.

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods justice, due unto the cruelties of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherfore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, upon so wicked foundations of innocent bloud, were soon after cast down, over-whelming themselves or their children, with the ruins, as the sequell will declare.

How Demetrius, the son of Antigonus, gave libertie to Athens, expelling the Garrison of Cassander out of those parts. The immoderate honour decreed by the Athenians to Antigonus and Demetrius.

NOne being left alive that had any title to the Kingdome, it stood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superiour, should freely professe themselves Kings in name, as they were already in substance. Yet had this name ill-beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did forbear it: neither seemed it convenient in the judgment of Antigonus, to crown his last action with such a title, as if he had attained unto greatnesse by that foul murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his own head. He purposed therfore to undertake a plausible enterprise, even the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get such honour as would not only drown all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of royaltie, whereof in seeming modestie, he was not covetous. To this purpose he delivered a strong army, with a Navie of two hundred and fiftie sail, and five thousand talents of silver, unto Demetrius his son: willing him to begin at Athens, and thence to proceed, in setting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: so that without resistance he entred the Haven; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Cassanders good friend, had bin arrived. But when it was known, both who he was, and what was the cause of his coming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations: Demetrius Phalereus forsook the town, and withdrew himself to Thebes under safe conduct; only the Garrison in Munychia strove to make good that piece, which after a while was won upon them by force. During the siege of Munychia, Demetrius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie.

I think it not impertinent, sometimes to relate such accidents, as may seem no better than meer trifles: for even by trifles are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly strain themselves, to the observance of generall commended rules, in lesser things they follow the impetuosity of their own Natures. The Lady Cratesipolis lay in Patræ, and had a great desire to see Demetrius; hoping, belike, that she might by his means better her estate, and recover her Towns of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie; to whose Lieutenants in those places, Demetrius before his departure out of Greece, offered money for the surrender of them. Yet the onely entisement pretended was love. He being advertised hereof, left his forces in the Country of Megara, and taking a company of his light armed, for guard of his person, made a long journey to meet with her. His troup he caused to lodge a great way from his Tent, that none might see her when she came. As chastly as the businesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it, whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonus, and bring him to any termes of reason, by taking his sonne prisoner. Their project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came so suddenly upon him, that he had no better shift, than to muffle himself in an old cloak, and creep away disguised, leaving them to ransack his Tent.

There was in this Prince a strange medly of contentions, especially an extreme unlikenesse in matters of pleasure, and a painfull industry in matter of Warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wit, excellent in devising Engines of Warre, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to withstand his bad fortune, than how to rule his good. For adversitie made his valour more active; prosperity puffed him with over weening, wherein he thought that he might do what he listed. His fortune was changeable, as were his qualities, turning often round like the pinnole of her wheel, till she had wound up the thread of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Camp, and finishing his businesse at Megara, he resolved no longer to stand upon the issue of a siege, to assail Munychia by force, that so he might accomplish the liberty of Athens: which, untill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the City. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the assault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the walls, prevailed upon the resistance of those that lay within it, and won the place in two dayes. The walls, and all the fortresses of that piece against the City, were levelled with the ground, and so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was given their liberty, with promise to aid them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industry. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues: converting to base flattery, that eloquence of theirs which the vertues of their Ancestors had suited unto more manly arguments.

They decreed unto Antigonus and Demetrius the name of Kings, they consecrated the place in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their City, and built there an Altar, calling it of Demetrius the alighter; they called them by the names of their Sauiours, ordaining that every year, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embassadours, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like as were they, whom they sent unto the Oracle of Jupiter or Apollo.

It were a frivolous diligence to rehearse all their flatteries, these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the young Prince, but made that acclamation, which best would have pleased the old man, to be of no use. For he could not handsomely take upon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians, unlesse he would seem to approve their vanity, in loading him with more than humane honours. Yet was he so tickled with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corn and Timber to build ships, he gave them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle; or rather so weak is great power in resisting the assaults of flattery.

§. XI.

The great victorie of Demetrius against Ptolomie in Cyprus. How Antigonus and Demetrius took upon them the stile of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

FRom this glorious work, Antigonus called away Demetrius, unto a businesse of greater difficultie; meaning to employ his service against Ptolomie, in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Counsell, that should treat of matters concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the meane time Antigonus withdrew his own Garrison out of Imbros, committing their liberty entire, into the peoples hands; whereby it might appear, that as he would not permit any other to oppresse the Greeks, so would he be farre from doing it himself. This was enough to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased Friends; it followed, that hee should convert his forces, to the winning of ground upon his Enemies.

A pitifull Tragedie had lately happed in Cyprus, through the indiscretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicocles, King of Paphos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus: yet not so far that he thought himself past recure, by which confidence, he was perhaps the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, and the faint-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was sent thither; who surrounding Nicocles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to have him yeelded to the death. Nicocles offered to clear himself; but Menelaus told him, that dye he must, and bad him come forth quietly. This desperate necessitie caused the unhappy King to rid himself of life: and his death strook such an impression into his wife, that she not onely slew her self, but perswaded the wives of her husbands brethren to do the like. Also those brethren of Nicocles, unto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the suddennesis of this calamitie, did shut up the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

Whatsoever the crime objected was, Nicocles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answer. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, for his rigorous proceeding; yet it is to be thought, that much dislike fell also upon Ptolomie: as men that are grieved, cast an ill affection even upon those that gave the furthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him, either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being sure that they should not themselves have the rule of their own Countrie. Menelaus therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Armie, and fought with Demetrius. But he was beaten, and driven to save himself within the walls of Salamis, where he was so hardly besieged, that without strong succour, he had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retain possession of the whole Iland. His greatest help at the present was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could win from him, nor good usage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keep from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercenaries: but all their goods were in Egypt, which was enough to keep them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long against the ods of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and against his terrible Engines of batterie, if Ptolomie had not hasted to the rescue.

Ptolomie brought with him a hundred and forty Gallies, besides two hundred ships of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This Fleet made a terrible shew, when it was descried a-farre; though more than half of it was unfit for service in fight at Sea. Wherefore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadful, Ptolomie sent unto Demetrius a threatning message: willing him to be gone, unlesse he would be overwhelmed with multitudes, and trampled to death in a throng. But this young gallant repaied him with words of as much braverie; promising to let him escape, upon condition, that he should withdraw his Garrisons out of Sycion and Corinth.

Demetrius had no more than one hundred and eighteen Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomie, better stored with weapons fit for that service; vice, and very well furnished with Engines in the prows, to beat upon the enemie. Nevertheless he stood in great doubt of threescore gallies that lay in the Haven of Salamis, left Menelaus with them should set upon his backe: in which case, it was very likely that all would goe very ill with him. Against this mischief, he bestowed ten of his own Gallies in the mouth of that Haven, to keep Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his Souldiers on the shore, to give what assistance they could, be with the rest of the Fleet, goe to Sea against Ptolemie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with doubtfull successe. The generals were not ranged opposite one to the other, but held each of them the left wing of his own fleet. Each of them prevailed against the squadron wherewith he encountred, but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally drave all to betake themselves unto speedy flight. As for Ptolemie, he was fain to leave his advantage upon the enemie in one part of the fight, that he might relieve and animate those of his own which needed him in another; wherein he found his losse over-great to be repaired, by continuing any longer against the fortune of that day, and therefore he laboured onely to save himself, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battell no unusuall accident, yet was the victory greater than could have been expected. The occasions whereof were partly the great skill in Sea-fight, which the Greeks and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had above those which followed Ptolemie: partly the good furniture of the Ships, wherein consisted no lesse, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manned. Further, we may reasonably judge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carrying the strength of Ptolemies Army, did not more encourage his own men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight, than breed in each part the contrarie affections, when in the beginning of the fight they fell off, and stood aloof. For though it were fitting that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vain conceits, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions to think themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation that Menelaus, issuing with his fleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in stern, was utterly frustrate. He was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to bar up the mouth of the Haven; which they manfully performed, as great necessitie required.

Such disappointment of expectation doth much abate the courage of men in fight; especially of the assailants: whereas on the contrarie, they that find some part of their fears vain, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceive an opinion of their own ability, to doe more than they thought upon, out of their not suffering the harm that they had imagined.

Whatsoever the causes of this victorie were, the fruit was very great. For Ptolemie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest of his fleet was either taken or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer strive against the violence of fortune; but yeelded up all that he held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelve thousand foot, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Haven of Salamis. The same dejection of spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had served the Egyptian by Land; none of them reposing any more confidence in Ptolemie, but willingly becomming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the Isle of Cyprus, for which they contended. Wherefore the common expectation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a year, till he were advertised of the issue. In this mood Aristodemus found him, a noble flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured with the Message of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himself of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyfull errand: Hee caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; he himself landed in a Cock-boat, which he sent immediatly back to the ship; and so all alone he went forward, looking very sadly, that no part of his tidings might appear in his countenance. Report of his arrivall (for it was not known where he had been) came presently to Antigonus, who sent Messenger after Messenger to meet him on the way, and bring speedy word how all went. But neither any answer, nor so much of a look, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could be won from this demure demure Gentleman. This enraged the fair and softly forward with a great throng of his Nobles, that served well to set out his Pageant, untill he came in sight of the Gate, who could not contain himself, but ran all about to open him the Gate, and hear the news. Then did Antigonus, upon the sudden, with a high mind, the salute of King, hearing the glad message of the victorie, with as much speed, as before he had covered it with silence, in the hearing of all the people, who with loud acclamations gave that name of King, both to Antigonus and his son Demetrius, of all requeall of the long absence, wherein Antigonus had held him, says, That it should also be long ere he received his reward. But the Title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did set on his head, he could not with a long time, wherefore he readily accepted them, and saw the like to his son.

When it was once noysed abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselves Kings, it was not long ere their fellows were ready to follow the good example. For more his friends would by no means endure, that their Lord should be thought a man despected for the losse of a fleet, therefore they saluted him also King. Ptolemeus in like had boldnesse enough to put the Diademe about his own head. Seleucus had, before time, among the barbarous people, taken upon him as King: but now he ruled the matter differently, as well among the Greeks and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Only Cassander held himself contented with his own name: whereby, how soever he might shadow his pride, he no way lessened the fame of his cruelty against his Masters house. But the name which he forbore, his sonnes after him were bold to usurp, though with ill successe, as will appear, when they shall enter upon the Stage, wherein these old Tragedians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, begin to play their parts, with bigger looks, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and judgement, than in the Scenes already past.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Wars between the Kings of Egypt, Asia, Macedon, Thrace, and others: untill all Alexanders Princes were consumed.

§. I.

The Expedition of Antigonus against Egypt, with ill successe.

ALl the rest of these Kings had taken that name upon them, in imitation of Antigonus himself, as beseeming his greatnesse: which was such as gave him hope to swallow them up, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his own strength, he resolved to single out Ptolomie, and make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose he prepared an army of eighteen thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with fourscore and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of hundred and fifty Gallies, and a hundred ships of burthen. The Land forces he commanded in person: of the Navie Demetrius was Admirall.

When all was ready for the journey, the Sea-men advised him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the rising of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to prevent all preparations for resistance that Ptolomie should make, rejected this counsell, imputing it rather to their fear than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia (a Town which he had built in Syria, and called after his own name, that was soon changed into Sylucia, by his mortall enemie) and came to Gaza, where he met with his Fleet. The nearer that he drew to Egypt, the more haste he made: thinking by celeritie to prevail more than by his great power. Hee caused his Souldiers to carry ten dayes provision of Victuals; and had many Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the Desarts, over which he marched with no small toil, though he met with no resistance. At Mount Casius, which is near adjoyning to Nilus, he saw his Fleet riding at Anchor, not far from the shore, in ill case, and many Ships wanting. It had been sorely beaten with foul weather, wherein some were lost, others driven back to Gaza, or scattered else-where into such creeks as they could recover: Demetrius himself, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it up against the wind, that all his fresh water was spent, in which extremity, he and all his must have perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in sight, from whom these over-wearied, thirsty and Sea-beaten Souldiers received relief. After these painful travels, there followed a War little lesse painfull than to little purpose; for Ptolomy had so fortified all the passages upon the Civer of Nilus, as he assured himself either to end the war there, or if his guards should happen to be forc'd, yet could it not be done but so much to the weakning of the assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Army (which he held entire) entertain the invader upon advantage enough. All that Antigonus sought, was to come to blows speedily: Ptolomy on the contrary, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Nilus gave him water enough, but wood he had none to warm it, and while Antigonus assaulted the Rampiers, raised upon the River, in vain, Ptolomy assaied the faith of his souldiers, with good successe; for with great gifts, and greater promises, he ferried them over so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments upon the passages next the enemy, and in the mean while taken a resolution to return, Ptolomy had turned him out of Egypt ill attended.

Some of them indeed he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those he put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he invaded Egypt, had he not readily removed his Army further off, from the noyse of their entertainment, that had already been won from him. To prevent therefore as well the present danger of his stay, as the shame following a late retrait, he secretly practised the advice of his Councell, upon whom the burthen might be laid of his entrance, and leaving Egypt.

It is indeed lesse prejudiciall in such like cases, that errors, dishonours, and losses, be laid on Counsellors and Captains, than on Kings; on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is far more precious than that of a Vassall. Louis the fift, as many other Princes have done, layd the losse and dishonour he received in the invasion of France, by the way of Provence, to Antonie de Leva, whether justly or no, I know not; but howsoever, all the Historians of that time agree, that the sorrow thereof cost that brave Captain his life. Certainly to give any violent advice in doubtful enterprises is rather a testimony of love, than of wisdom, in the giver; for the ill successe is alwaies cast upon the Counsell, the good never wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have sometime known it, that great Commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, have not onely been disswaded, but held, in a kind by strong hand, from hazzarding their own persons, and yet have those kind of Mutiners never been called to a Marshals Court,

§. II.

How the Citie of Rhodes was besieged by Demetrius.

THis departure of Antigonus, left behind it many dead carcasses, and a great deal of joy in Egypt. Ptolomy held a solemn Feast, and sent Messengers abroad, loaden with glad news, to Seleucus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side, with the report of this his late felicity, though it appeared but in a defensive War. Antigonus on the contrary, flattered himself with another interpretation, calling the joys of his enemies for witnesses of his own greatness, seeing they arose but from so little things: his enemies being but bare savers by the last bargain, and himself, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retrait. Howsoever it were, yet he meant to follow his affairs hence-forth in another fashion; for that which he could not cleave a-sunder by great blows, he purposed by little and little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first, to fell the Tree it self with the more facility. To effect which, he resolved (leaving the great ones to grow awhile) to root up the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the fore-named Confederates should be forc't either to relieve, or to lose; and hereby he doubted not to draw them into the field, where the advantage of power, and of all other warlike provision promised him victory.

At this time the Citie of Rhodes was very mighty, being well governed, and having long held it self in good Neutrality; it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and therein a great deal of riches to it self; to maintain which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed Ships, by which it not onely beat off all Pyrates and petty Theeves, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacy.

In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either refuse all that sought them, and so stand friendlesse and apart, or joyn themselves to some one, and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had grown) their affections carryed them to the Egyptian, both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnesse, and neighbourhood was fearfull unto them. This affection of theirs, with some other passages more apparent, gave argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himself against them by petty injuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grievances, while he made a more weighty preparation, to pursue the War against them openly and strongly. All things soon after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, he employed his Son Demetrius against them in their own Iland, who brought such terrour upon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their assistance and service against whomsoever. Demetrius, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perswaded by fear, and not by love, raised his demands to an intolerable height, requiring a hundred Hostages to be delivered him, and liberty to lodge in their Port as many ships of War as himself pleased. These conditions more properly to be imposed upon a State already conquered, than on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a confirmed assistance, restored unto the Rhodians their lost courage, & made them resolve to defend their liberty to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bondmen, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselves fellow-slaves with them.

Demetrius having refused the fair conditions offered (as the Rhodians the fearfull ones propounded unto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and finding no appearance to carry the place in furie, he set in hand with his Engines of battery, in the invention and use of which, he did never shew himself a greater Artisan, than in this War. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the assaults given them for a whole year, after many brave sallies out of the Town, and the famine which they endured within the Town, which had proved far more extreme, if Ptolomy had not with many hazzards relieved them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gave over the siege, a hundred hostages they gave him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magistrates and Officers of the Citie.

Hereunto Demetrius was brought by the usuall policie of War, and state: for while with the flower of all his fathers forces he lay before Rhodes, Cassander recovered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him; neither did Cassander make the War as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded army, which he himself led as far as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and endangered Athens it self. On the other side (though with lesse successe) did Polysperchon invade Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece advised the Athenians and Aetolians to dispatch their Embassadors towards Demetrius, and advised Demetrius rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten by setting all Greece at liberty.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, than that the Rhodians erected statues in honour of Lysimachus and Cassander, but for Ptolomy, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most relief, they consulted with the Oracle of Jupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a god. The Priests which attended in the Temple of Hammon, gave the same fair answer for Ptolomy, which they had formerly done for Alexander his his Master; for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Army at his heels, so was Ptolomy at this time Lord of the soil: and yet was this a far more cleanly creation than that done by the Athenians, who deified Antigonus and Demetrius by decree of the people. A mad age it was, when so many of Alexanders Captains could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needs be called gods.

§. III.

How Demetrius prevailed in Greece. Cassander desires peace of Antigonus, and cannot obtain it. Great preparations of War against Antigonus.

Demetrius comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece, quickly drave Cassander out of Attica, and pursuing his fortune, chased him beyond the straits of Thermopylæ. Herein his reputation did much avail him; which was so great, that six thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted unto him. So, partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recovered in short space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giving libertie unto the people, he bestowed upon the Athenians those peeces, which had been fortified against them, to block them up. Then went hee into Peloponnesus, where hee found the like, or more easie successe: for he suddenly took Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Country, bestowing liberty upon such as needed it. The Town of Sicyon he translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old seat into another place, and called it after his own name, Demetrius. This done, he betook himself to his pleasure. At the Isthmian games, hee caused himself to be proclamed Captain Generall of Greece, as Philip and Alexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of jest, that any, save himself or his father, should usurp the Name of King. But in his behaviour hee was so farre unlike to a King, that in all the time of his leasure, he deserved none other name than of a drunken Pasiard. Yet were the Athenians as ready as ever to devise new honours for him: among which they made one Decree, That whatsoever King Demetrius should command, ought to be held sacred with the gods, and just with men.

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great fear, lest the war should fall heavily upon him in Macedon: which to avoyd, he knew no better way than to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose he sent Embassadours; but had no better answer from Antigonus, than that he should submit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him look about him, and labour hard in soliciting his friends, both to assist him, and take heed to themselves, neither found he them slow in apprehending the common danger: for Lysimachus knew that if once Cassander had lost Macedon, Demetrius would soon be Master of Thrace. Neither were Ptolomie and Seleucus ignorant of that which was like to befall them, if Antigonus were suffered to put himself in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt forces they should all together set upon the common enemy.

Hereof Antigonus had notice, but scorned all their preperations, saying, That he would easily scatter them as a flock of birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceits he pleased himself, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemie. He lay at that time in his Town of Antigonia (a name that it must shortly lose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glory. But thither was brought unto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellespont, For Cassander had committed unto Lysimachus part of his forces, wherewith to passe over into Asia, while he himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe side. So Lysimachus passing the Hellespont, began to make hot War upon the subjects of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to joyn with him by fair means: winning others by force, and wasting the Country round about.

To represse this unexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hasty journies, and came soon enough to recover his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus home, or compell him to come to battell. Lysimachus waited for the comming of Seleucus; keeping ping himself the whilest from necessity of fighting. But Babylon was far off; and Seleucus his preparations were too great to be soon in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his journy: which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrell in open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus been so forward, that he refused to yeeld upon any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neer with a mighty Army of his own (for he had gathered strength in that long time of leasure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great aid from Ptolomie, that was joyned with his forces.

To help in this needfull ease, Demetrius was called over into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeyed. Before his departure out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, upon reasonable termes: to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Army for defence of the Country, and that his journy might be without any such blemish of reputation, as if hee had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at liberty. Cassander was glad to be rid of an Enemy that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise than they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It sufficed, that for the present, every one found means to clear himself of all incumbrances else-where, to the end that each of them might freely apply himself to the tryall of the main controversie in Asia.

§. IV.

How Antigonus was slain in a great battell at Ipsus, neer unto Ephesus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

SELEUCUS, with his Sonne Antiochus, joyning with Lysimachus, compounded a great Armie, which was (all considered) not inferiour to that of the Enemy. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all Warres, but especially in the Civill) they were rather unanswerable than unequall to their adversaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them under with a mastering spirit, and had been reputed a King indeed, when the rest were held but Usurpers of the Title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brave Commander, having given proof of his worth in many great services of all kinds, and enriched the art of war with many inventions, which even his enemies, and particularly Lysimachus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stoln away from him to save his life, with young Antiochus, a Prince not heard of before this journy; and Lysimachus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his own from the wilde Thracians, wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captains under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthy enough to receive any benefit that fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for the most part hardy and well exercised: many of them having served under Alexander; though of those old Companies, the long space of two and twenty years had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections, the followers of Seleucus were easily perswaded, that in this battell they must either get the upper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged unto the Confederate Princes; whereas Antigonus his men could discern no other necessitie of fighting, than the obstinate quality of their Lord, that needs would be Master of all. Antigonus had about threescore and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and threescore and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were six thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the oddes of five hundred; of Elephants they had four hundred, and an hundred and twenty armed Chariots of War: which helps, though they little had availed the Persians, yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captain.

Antigonus himself, either troubled with the unexpected greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensive, communing much in private with his Son whom he commended to the Army as his Successor: whereas in [illegible] he had never been so fondly observed in the heate of battell, nor had [illegible] accustomed to make his Son, or any other, private to his counsell before it recei-[illegible] Either ordered it a-head back, either for going the right, or afterwards the [illegible] it is needless to rehearse. Diana of Ephesus dwelt near to the place of battell, [illegible] oddes in many great fights, and therefore likely to have been thrust into [illegible] if any manner, recently rebuilding a Temple, that chanced.

[illegible] to be believed, that the two so gallant Armies, containing well neer all the [illegible] of the Asian Hole Empire, performed a horrible fight, being led by such wor[illegible] Commanders, and whose issue thereof was mighty doubtfull. Yet are few of the [illegible] recorded to an easie losse in regard of the much variety, wherewith every [illegible] in this kinde. The most memorable thing in the battell, were these:
[illegible] with his best force of horse, charged valiantly upon young Antiochus; whom [illegible] had broken, and put to flight, he was so transported with the heat of his good [illegible] that he never gave over the pursuit, but left his Father naked, and lost the very [illegible] and the victory. For when Seleucus perceived this advantage, he enterposed [illegible] betweene Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus, and with many troupes [illegible] offering to break upon the enemies battell, wheresoever it lay most open, he [illegible] the [illegible] a great part of them rather chose to revolt from [illegible] whilest they were fondly divided, than to sustaine the fury of so dangerous [illegible] This bold attempt, or rather occasion of some discouraged others; and [illegible] all them at once into flight, exposing their Generall to the last end of his dominion.
[illegible] was then fourescore years old, very fat and unwildy, so that he was unapt [illegible] if his high spirit could have entertained any thought thereof. He had about [illegible] of his owne trusty followers, and as many others as he could hold together.
[illegible] that perceived a great troupe running towards his person, told him, Sir [illegible] company we must to change you; He answered, We may they; for who defends [illegible] Demetrius will relieve us. This expecting to the very last, that his Son [illegible] came to the rescue, he resolved to many Dartes into his body, as took away his [illegible] ambitious, but then feare full hopes, together with his troublesome life.
[illegible] great ability in matter of Armes, together with his unfortunate desire of Empire, [illegible] sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his actions. He was more feared by [illegible] than loved by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but [illegible] insolence toward all alike, as if it had been some vertue necessary, representing a [illegible] Majesty. This was the cause that so many of his followers revolted to his ene-[illegible] and finally, that a great part of his Army forsook him in his last necessity. For [illegible] Kings and Princes that call all the careful endeavours of their Vassalls, onely [illegible] debts, and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the great[illegible] services; shall finde themselves upon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is love [illegible] stairs by adversity) not onely the most friendlesse, but even the most con-[illegible] and despised of all others. This Antigonus found true in part, while he lived, [illegible] he left it to be verified upon his Son.

[illegible] Demetrius, forsaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to [illegible] Seleucus and Ptolomy, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entering into [illegible] Demetrius, at his return from the like pursuit of young Antiochus, finding all [illegible] lost, was glad to save himself, with foure thousand horse and five thou[illegible] by a speedy retraite unto Ephesus, whence he made great haste unto A-[illegible] to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whilest he was [illegible] dest of his counsels thither, the Athenian Embassadours met him with a decree [illegible] people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Ci[illegible] were Embassadours, not Tyrants, or Counsellers with the Oracle. It was a [illegible] ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his misery, [illegible] decree: neither did any part of his calamity more afflict the unfortunate

Prince than to see his adversity despised by those whom he had thought his fastest friends. Yet was he fain to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Haven, of which he now stood in great need; and therefore was faine to speak faire, that sometimes had grossly flattered him. But he shall live to teach them their old language, and speak unto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he sailed to the Isthmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomforts. His Garrisons were every where broken up, the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was forced of a small Army and Fleet, without money or victuals wherewith to sustain him and his followers any long time. All the rest, or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerors, and those few places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the truth of what had happened) he no way knew how to relieve. For to put himself into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power; and to inclose himself in any of them, how strong soever, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeed to bury himself and his estate. He therefore creeping through those bushes that had fewest briers, fell upon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdom, whereof he gave all the spoile that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his own losses having been too great to be repayed again by small prizes.

In the meane while the Confederate Princes had wherewithall to busie themselves in the partition of those Provinces, of which their late victory had made them Lords. Wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being present, and Master of the field: for neither Ptolomy nor Cassander, were at the overthrow given, having onely sent certain troupes to reinforce the army which Seleucus led, who took hold of a part of the lesse, and all Syria, being no otherwise divided from his own Territory, than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any Order been taken by the Confederates for the division of all those Lands; because they did not expect so prosperous an issue of that war, which they made onely in their own common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleucus to make the best benefit that he could of the victory, at which nevertheless others did repine; and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet seeing the over great neere of Seleucus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted upon the same reason of State as before, how to oppose it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined; for he read it in the Law universall of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendships on all sides, and cure themselves of all unprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loves being laid on the one side against their profits on the other, were found so far too light, as Seleucus, who had to day slain Antigonus the father, and driven Demetrius the son out of Asia, fought to morrow how to match himself with Stratonice, Demetrius his Daughter, and so by Demetrius to leave his turne against Lysimachus.

The story of this Stratonice, with whom young Antigonus, the son of Seleucus fell so passionately in love, and so distempered, as Erasistratus his father, to save his sons life, gave her (though shee were his wife) unto him; and how his passion was discovered by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this alliance between Seleucus and Demetrius; between Ptolomy and Lysimachus; between Demetrius and Cassander; between Demetrius and Ptolomy; though for the present it brought him again into the rank of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages between Christian Kings have done in latter times, namely between the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of those elder times been found more faithfull, than those of the same latter times have been, as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan, and others, the Reader may observe: between whom from the yeer of our Lord, One thousand foure hundred ninety and five, when Charles the eighth undertook the Conquest of Naples, to the yeer One thousand five hundred fifty and eight, when Henry the second died, the Histories of those times tell us, that all the bonds, either by the Bed or by the Booke, either by Weddings, or Sacramentall Oaths, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reap his profit by giving his daughter to his enemy Seleucus, that he recovered Silicia from Pleistarchus, the brother of Cassander, who had gotten it in his his share in the division of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to hold it by his proper forces from him, that entred upon it as a lawfull heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any help, as by the rule of Confederacy he should have done against the common enemy. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint, as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went unto Cassander; whither Phila, their sister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keep all quiet, being sent for that purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Cassander, & therefore glad to make use of that bond of alliance betwixt them, whereof in his own prosperity, he never took notice to the others good. About the same time he took to wife a daughter of Ptolomy (plurality of wives being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Eastern conquests) and so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, than strengthened with two friends; for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise than might seem to advance their own ambitious desires. Seleucus and Ptolomy could both of them have been contented better, that Demetrius, with help of their countenance, should seek his fortune somewhat farther off, than settle his estate under their noses. Particularly, Seleucus thought that Cilicia lay very fit for himself: and Ptolomy had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Iland Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would fain have set his new father-in-law upon the neck of Lysimachus; or whether he were indeed greedy of the bargain; he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready money, his late purchase of Cilicia. But to Demetrius would not hearken, but meant to keep as much land as he could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serve him to make sport a while. This refusall so displeased Seleucus, that in angry terms he demanded the Cities of Tyre and Sidon, to be surrendred unto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battell. Instead of giving them up, Demetrius took present order to have them better manned, and spake it stoutly, That were he overcome a thousand times, yet would he not give Seleucus to become his Son-in-law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended as one of a malignant disposition, that would break friendship with his Father-in-law for two Towns, from whom he had already taken more than well he knew how to governe. But the fire consumed it self in words, which had it fastened upon deeds, like it is that the weaker should have found friends out of envie to the stronger.

§. VI.

How Demetrius won the City of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but lost in Asia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of Cassander.

In the meane while, the Athenians, not knowing how to use the liberty which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, under the Tyranny of Lachares. Through which alteration their distempered City was so weakened, that it seemed not able to keep off the punishment due to their late ingratitude. This advantage fastned him, whom they had once called their God and Saviour, to present himself unto them, in the habit of a revenging fury. He brought against them all the force that he could well spare from other employments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Eastern friends, were unwilling to give him pediment to any businesse, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had ill success; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soon repaired the losse; and after some victories in Peloponnesus, where he won divers Towns that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprise, wasted the Country of Attica, and cut off all relief from the City, both by Land and Sea. Athens was not able to feed the great multitude within it any long time: for it stood in a barren soil, and wanted now the command of those Ilands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victuals; being also destitute of meanes to keep such a Navie, as might bring in supply, or dare to do any thing at Sea, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomy, who (trusting thereby to win the love of Greece) had loaden an 150. ships with corne, and sent them to relieve the hungry City. But these hundred and fifty were unable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore hasted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come so neer that they might be descried. This brake the heart of the people, among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Son did fight for a dead mouse, which dropped down between them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embassadours to yeeld up the Town, and crave pardon, having so far offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence to propose any motion of peace. Yet were they fain to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, than because they hoped to be forgiven.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victory, did not onely forbare to take away the lives of these unthankfull men, which they had submitted unto his mercy; but out of his liberality gave them food, and placed in Office amongst them such as were most acceptable to the people. Nevertheless he was grown wiser than to trust them so far as he had done in times past. And therefore, when (among other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Havens, and dispose of them at his pleasure; he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a sure Garrison within their walls, to keep them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedemonians in two battels, and was in very faire possibility to take their City: when the dangerous newes of Lysimachus and Ptolomy, that prevailed faster upon him elsewhere, than himself did upon his enemies in Greece, called him in all haste. Lysimachus had won many Towns in Asia; Ptolomy had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the City of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children and Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilest he was bethinking himself which way to turn his face, a notable piece of businesse offered it self, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Cassander was lately dead in Macedon, and soon after him, Philip his eldest son, whose two yonger brethren, Antipater and Alexander, sought for the Kingdom. In this quarrell Thessalonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Cassander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, than to her elder son: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his own Mother. The odiousnesse of this fact gave a fair lustre to Alexanders cause: drawing the generality of the Macedons to take his part, as in revenge of the Queens death, upon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good without some forraign aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will soon appeare in the following Tragedy, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had been one that shifted well for himself, at such time as every man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered division of the Empire. He was cunning in practice, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing than were his Companions, but withall more impudent, rudely killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memory of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, upon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditary quarrell, derived from his father, whom she could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him by cruelty that she used against his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure upon shedding the Royall blood wherewith, when once he had stained his hands, he did not care how far he proceeded in that course of murder. His carefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose lives hindred his purpose, argues him to have been rather skilfull in matters of arms, than a valiant man: such cruelty being a true mark of cowardize, which fears a-far off the dangers, that may quietly passe away: and seeks to avoid them by base and wicked meanes, as never thinking it self safe enough, until there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may be said, that they had well deserved the bloudy end which over-took them; yet it beseemed not Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men, deserved to die for the tyranny of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the divine Justice brought swords upon his wife and children, that well revenged the cruelty of this bloudy man, by destroying his whole house as he had done his Masters.

Pyrrhus and his doings in Macedon. The death of Cassanders children. Demetrius gets the Kingdome of Macedon; prevailes in war against the Greeks; Loseth reputation in his warre against Pyrrhus, and in his civill Government, and prepares to win Asia. How all conspire against Demetrius. Pyrrhus and Lysimachus invade him, his Army yeelds to Pyrrhus, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with Lysimachus.

Pyrrhus, the Son of that unfortunate Prince Æacides, which perished in war against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a suckling Infant, from the fury of his Father enemies. When his Fosterers had conveighed him to Glaucias King of Illyria; the deadly hatred of Cassander would have bought his life, with the price of two hundred Talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his heire. Glaucias was so farre from betraying Pyrrhus, that he restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelve yeers of age. Within the compasse of six yeers, either the indiscretion of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, drave him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went he to Demetrius (who married his sister) became his Page, followed him a while in his wars, was with him in the great battell of Ipsus, whence he fled with him to Ephesus; and was content to be hostage for him in his reconciliation with Ptolomy. In Egypt he so behaved himself, that he got the love of Berenice, Ptolomies principall wife; so that he married her daughter, and was afterwards sent home, with mony and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomy than to Demetrius. When he had fully recovered the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that busines between the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sons, was so fat too weak for Pyrrhus, that he had no power to attend the coming of Demetrius, but made an hasty agreement, & divided the Kingdom with his younger brother Alexander; who likewise felt the aide of Pyrrhus so troublesome, that he was more willing to send him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacity to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Country, as the reward of his pains: having the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessity enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who took the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so far with an Army, and finde no work for it. This was a frivolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this over-diligent friend, by murdering him upon some advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the story, and it might be true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wisest, beleeved it not. But the issue was, that Alexander himself was feasted and killed by Demetrius; who took his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; covering the fact so well, by telling his own danger, and what a naughty man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in war with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seek peace of Demetrius, which to obtain, he caused the remainder of Macedon to be given up; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his Son-in-law. At this ill bargaine Antipater grievously fretted, though he knew not how to amend it: yet still he stormed, untill his Father-in-law, to save the labour of making many excuses, took away his troublesome life. This in haste, with a kind of neglect, and as it were to avoid molestation, were slaine the children of Cassander: of Cassander that had slain his own Masters children, in a wise course of policy, with carefull meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to erect his own house, that fell down upon his grave, ere the earth on it was throughly settled.

It might be thought, that such an accesse of Dominion, added much to the greatness of Demetrius. But in deed it shewed his infirmity; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no art of civill Government: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the use and fruit of a Kingdom, to be none other, than to doe what a King listed. He gave himself over to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those which offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing justice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdom, than in ruling it: war being his recreation, and luxury his nature. By long rest (as six years reign is long to him, that knows not how to reign one yeer) he discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idlenesse; and the Souldiers of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This afforded him the better leisure, of making war in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would fain have done somewhat (the peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good ease to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this journy purchased nothing but enmity. Another expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made excursions into Thessaly. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himself strong enough, to over-run his enemies Country, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have known raw Novices in that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captain, whom latter ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he misled that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, shewed in single combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lievtenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The losse of this battell did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a Counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the office of a Captain.

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their own King; whom they began to dis-esteeme, not so much in regard of his unprofitable journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Country, and brought home his Army in good ease) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparrell seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not onely too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very unmanly; and serving chiefly to bee a daily witnesse, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his souldiers lives he was reckelesse: and suffered unwisely this un-princely sentance to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of justice; and (as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a shew of popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gratious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor suters after him in great hope, till coming to a bridge, he threw all their writings into a River; pleasing himself, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost won it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on work in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia, with a Royall Army: wherein the fortune of one battell might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so he might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, almoſt a hundred thouſand foot, and twelve thouſand horſes with a Navie of five hundred ſaile, wherein were many ſhips, far exceeding the greatneſſe of any that had been ſeen before, yet ſo ſwift and uſefull withall, that the greatneſſe was leaſt part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of theſe preparations, made Seleuchus and Ptolomy ſuſpect their own forces, and labour hard with Lyſimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyn againſt this ambitious ſon of Antigonus, that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his father. It was eaſily diſcerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Aſia, there could be no ſecurity for his friends in Europe, what league ſoever were of old concluded. Therefore they reſolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon that lay next his own Kingdom. Lyſimachus came firſt, and againſt him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whileſt he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Camp, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhœa. The matter was not over great: but it ſhewed, that minds prepared with long diſcontent, are ready to lay hold upon ſmall occaſions of diſlike. All the camp was in uproare: ſome wept, others raged, few or none of them beare to utter ſeditious words, and many deſired leave of Demetrius, to goe to their own houſes, meaning indeed to have gone to Lyſimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wiſeſt way to lead the Macedonians further off from Lyſimachus their own countriman, againſt one that was a ſtranger: hoping by victory againſt the Epirot, to recover the love of his followers, in ſuch ſort that he might afterwards at leiſure deale with the other. But herein his wiſedom beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as haſty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to ſee that noble Prince, of whom they only heard the honourable fame. Some ſpake of his valour; ſome enquired, others anſwered, of his perſon, his armour; and other tokens whereby he might be known; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his creſt. It was not likely, that theſe men ſhould hurt him. Divers of them ſtole away, and ran over into Pyrrhus his camp: where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their perſons. For they ſaid, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get ſight of Pyrrhus, they would all ſalute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and preſented himſelf bareheaded in view of the camp, whither ſome were ſent before to prepare his welcome. The newes of his arrivall found a generall applauſe, and every one began to look out, with deſire to ſet eye on him. His face was not ſo well known as his Helmet; therefore he was admoniſhed to put it on: which done, all came about him, and proffered their ſervice; neither were there any, that ſpake for Demetrius; onely ſome (and they the moſt moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and ſhift for himſelf. So Demetrius threw aſide his makers habit, and attyring himſelf poorly, did fearfully ſteale away out of his own camp, deſerving well this calamity: whether it were ſo, that he would not hearken to the good counſell of his friends, or whether his behaviour deprived him of ſuch friends, as would dare to let him heare the unpleaſant ſound of neceſſary truth.

Whileſt Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdom of Macedon; Lyſimachus came upon him very unſeaſonably, and would needs have half: ſaying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the war; and therefore had reaſon to challenge his part of the gain. The bargain was quickly made, and the diviſion agreed upon: each of them being rather deſirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to work his fellow quite out of all, upon better opportunity.

§. VIII.

The Demetrius gathering forces, enterpriſeth many things with ill ſucceſſe, in Greece and Aſia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yeeld himſelf. His impriſonment and death.

The Athenians were as unthankfull to Demetrius in this his adverſity, as they had been in former times. For they preſently forſook his friendſhip, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to bee their Patron. Demetrius, when he went againſt Lyſimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, under his ſon Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had ſoon gotten an Army, though Phila his wife (who

(who is highly commended for a wise and vertuous Lady) did poyson her self, upon desperate grief for his misfortune. The first, upon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deserved it. He began to lay siege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they had made their spoke-man; and taking fair words in stead of satisfaction, passed over into Asia, with eleven thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his first coming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile upon him. For many good Towns, willingly, or by compulsion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also some Captains that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies and treasures. But it was not longer ere Agathocles the son of Lysimachus, came upon him with an army so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazzard his last stock against it. Wherefore, he resolved to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a Kingdom somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsell was grievously impeached by Agathocles who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which ways he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: nevertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titulary King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the river Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travell with such speed as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent deseases following famine, and other accidents of war, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captain, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Country; but with vehement and humble letters he besought his Son-in-law, to call to mind their alliance, and to pitty him in his great misery. These letters, at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himself, when he recovered strength after the battell at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none took effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore, meer desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickneese took and held him forty dayes, in which time, a great number of his few men, ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by fugitives, that gave alarme. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsook him) to yeeld unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his own humanity, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a demy-Island, wherein were goodly Walkes, Orchards, and Parkes for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high countries. In this sort he spent three yeers, living merily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happineese, which with so much travell and bloud-shed, he had sought in vain) and then dyed, leaving to his son Antigonus, the same which his father had left unto himself; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it self hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was last of Alexanders Captains; with other occurrences.

About the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, war-like, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines many children, out of whom he selected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and caused him to reign together with himself, two or three yeers before he died, that so he might confirm him in the inheritance of the Kingdom. At this Ptolomy Ceraunus (for all of that house affected the name of Ptolomy) was grievously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainment. There were now onely two of Alexanders Captains left, Seleuchus and Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrell, was their neer equality or strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed upon many of the Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest son: whose wife and children fled unto Seleucus for aid.

The Macedons, after seven moneths pause, having spent their first heat of admiration began to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their naturall Country-man, that they forsook Pyrrhus, upon none other ground than because he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him that they lightly gave him. Lysimachus had reigned about five yeers alone, when the City of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by events, to have fore-shewed the fall of his house. His own jealousie, and the instigation of a mother-in-law, caused him to poyson his son Agathocles; which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the losse of all his fifteen children that were taken away by divers accidents) he perished himself.

Antiochus was encountred by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battell concluded the war, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victory, that he was rid of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he seemed to himself alone and Heir of all the conquered World. So he passed over into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his race, and within seven moneths followed Lysimachus, and others of his fellows, by a violent death, being treacherously slain by Ptolomy Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and seven yeer old he was, when he fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seventy and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captains, who had been the dayes as it were of another World under the Persian: yet was there none equall to any of them in the Art of War: even Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we spoke before, that is now ready to enter into war with the Romans, a more warlike people than Alexander himself did ever encounter. Of which war, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a story more important, than any ready to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms that were held by Alexanders Captains, with lesse (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

The growth of Rome: and settling of the Eastern Kingdoms.

How the Romanes enlarged their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hostilius, unto such time as they were assailed by Pyrrhus.

HOw Rome was founded by Romulus; settled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many (though small) victories, it gathered strength, unto such time as it became the head of Latium, by the conquest of Alba, in the reign of Tullus Hostilius: it hath been already noted, in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatnesse beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it self out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like cases I have done) briefly to set down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of those many actions, which could not have been delivered in the ages, wherein they were severally performed, without much interruption of the History, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hostilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty yeers, was burnt together with his house by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-childe to Numa Pompilius by his daughter, and not much unlike him in disposition, succeeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about; enlarged it with the Hill Aventine, which he enclosed; built a bridge over Tybris, and the City of Ostia upon the Sea, fifteen miles distant from Rome. Finally, having reigned 24. yeers, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the son of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypselus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of which Town he was afterwards called Tarquinius. From that City in Hetruria coming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tanaquils prophecy, he grew a favorite of Ancus Martius; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Romane Court, insomuch, that after his decease he became not onely Protectour to the children, but Governour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senatours, and enlarged the Centurions of Horsmen: neither was he lesse eminent in war, than in peace: for he prevailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph took their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned 38. yeers, he was slain by the sons of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and sick, but not dangerously. And withall signified unto them, that in the interim of his sicknes, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwayes prophesied to be born to great hopes (the son of P. Corniculanus and Ocrisia, a well descended, but captive woman) brought up in her house, and husband unto her daughter, should supply her husbands place, in governing the State, untill his recovery: which government; being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards usurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and Valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourscore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good sort, as if it had been a private household. At length, having two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding also that the two sons of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Arruns, which had been committed unto his tuition, were of different dispositions, proportionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oile, to fire) gave the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed son, and the violent, to Arruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courses, or by accident, it hapned; the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joyned in marriage: who concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom: this impudent Servius hastening to the Senate, (where he thought by his presence to have bridled insolency) was thrown down the staires, and going home was slain by the way, when he had reigned 44. years. Then Tullia his daughter first proclaiming her Husband Tarquinius Superbus King, returning home, bids her Coachman to drive his Chariot over her fathers corps; whereupon the street took the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquinius, exercising cruelty without measure, and tyranny without mercy, upon the people and Senators; having tired them at home, used the same rage of treachery upon his borders. He took Suessa Pometia, and the Gabii. The issue of besieging Ardea, a town eighteen miles from Rome, was of hard successe. In the heat of which war, his son Sextus violently ravished (that chaste Lady Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wife: who as a expiation for so unchaste a deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamy with her own bloud; so having first bequeathed the revenge unto her father Sp.

Lucretius, her husband Collatine, and Junius Brutus) she kill'd her self: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his resolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife & children deposed and banished; and fled to Porsenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the two and twentieth yeer of his reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which space Rome had scarce got an possession of fifteen miles about it. Brutus by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his Countrey from that heavy yoak of bondage, inforced the people by solemne oath, never to admit any government by Kings amongst them: whereupon they ransacked their Kings consecrated their goods to Mars, and conferred the government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetuall to annuall, and from a single government to a double; lest perpetuall or sole dominion might be some motive to tyranny: and in stead of Kings they called them Consuls, signifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwayes mindfull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard settling troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, scarce daring to allow themselves of their own security, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to resign up his authority, fearing that tyranny would be hereditary, and supposing that the very name affinity with the house of Tarquine, savoured already of their condition. In his room was substitute Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be loved in the peoples eyes, gave liberty, in matters of controversie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people: and that he might as well in goods as in person, avoid occasion of suspition, caused his own house to be pulled down, because it was built in a conspicuous place, as if it had been a Cittadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matters of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples safety, as their favour: having got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first rank his own sons, were itching after innovations, hoping to restore the banished Kings; he caused them publickly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpardoned to the block. The Romans, having by the unblemished integrity of Brutus, well appeased their civil quarrels at home, now hereafter employed their military designements abroad: first, for their liberty; secondly, for enlarging of their possessions; thirdly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Latium situated as it were in the mid-way between Latium and the Tuscans, having as yet narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but give occasion of offence to her neighbours; untill by main opposition, having prevailed against her borderers, she made them as instruments, whereby to obtain the rest.

The first war, in the first yeer of Consuls, was against Porsenna King of Hetruria: who being over-perswaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seat him again in his Kingdom.
In the first conflict Horatius Cocles, having long time born the main brunt of his enemies on the bridge over Tiber, at length, feeling himself too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behind him to be broken down, and with his armour, leaping into into the River, like a hunted Stagge, refreshed his hot spirits, and incouraged his fellowes, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porsenna, although he had well-nigh won the hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance into the City, found the victory, in a manner, assuredly his own: yet admiring their valour, and repelled by the constant resolution of Mutius Scævola (who having by errour slain [illegible] his Secretary in stead of the King himself, did in scorne of torments abroad burne off his own hand) he thought it not any whit prejudiciall either to his safety, honour, to enter league with them at the worst hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius hate was not quite abated, though Arruns his son, and Brutus, his enemy, in fight had slain each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutus, got this their Ladies, whose Champion he was, for their chastity, not for beauty, mourned losse of him one whole year. Into his place, for the residue of his yeer, was [illegible] Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeer expired) Horatius Pulvillus [illegible]

Tarquin upon his overthrow, feeling the fates disastrous, thought it no boot to [illegible] against the stream, but spent the residue of his time, which was about fourteen years, privately at Cumæ. Yet his Son-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching [illegible] those old injuries, but also Porsenna had made peace with the Romans, and denied [illegible] their succour, hee Tarquinius, mustered up his Latines, and gave battell to the Romans, at the Lake Regillus; where the conflict was fierce, and the issue uncertain. Aulus Postumius the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy [illegible] Consuls, purposely for this warre, when fear was expected to exasperate his Souldiers courage, threw their own Ensignes amidst the Enemies; and Cassius, or Sporius [illegible] (Master of the Horsemen, an assistant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Ensignes. This fight was so well performed, that a report went of Castor and Pollux, [illegible] who came on milk-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesse of their valour, and fellow-workers of their victory; for the Generall consecrated a Temple to them, as a requitall for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themselves at home; and the fifteenth yeer after the Kings expulsion, upon instigation of some desperate bankrouts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Consuls, they made an uproare in the holy Mount; which by Menenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and belly discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whom they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controversies, the Consuls authority notwithstanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this atonement among themselves, they had continuall War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits; and with other neighbouring [illegible] Among these, the Volsci and Æqui held them longest; who made War of themselves upon the Romans: whereby they lost the best City in their whole jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, C. Martius got the surname of Coriolanus; a name honorable then, as driven from a great victory; although, by reason of the poverty of the Town, a Roman General, in other times, would have been ashamed of that title. But yet these gaue him no occasion of disparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, advised to sell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon Decius Actius, their Tribune, in their behalf, accused him, & after judgement banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volsci, whom lately before he had vanquished, incensed them to renue their forces again; which being committed unto him, & to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, so far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made so sharp war, and was at such defiance with his Country, that he would not release by any supplication of Embassadours, untill his mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves better Subjects to their Country than friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome than was any force of Armes. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Army, was after put to death among the Volsci, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunity: or (as others surmise) living with them untill old age, he died naturally.

Not

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans; againſt whom the Fabii, three hundred and ſix in number, all of one Family, intreated and obtained, that they onely might be employed, as it had been in a private quarrell. Theſe Fabii, after ſome good ſervices, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumvented, and all ſlain: one onely of that whole houſe had been left, by reaſon of infancy, at home; from whom afterward ſprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquiſhed Hannibal.

In proceſſe of time, the Romans were alſo troubled with the Volſci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Conſul, with his whole army, had been diſcomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus choſen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the higheſt honour in Rome, with ſucceſſe anſwerable to his expedition, diſcomfited his enemies, and freed his country in the ſpace of ſixteen dayes. In the conſulſhip of this Volſcian war, it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeers before choſen Governours of the State, and Inactors of Solons laws amongſt them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Conſuls, and all other Magiſtrates) would have raviſhed Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captain of a company, and lying then in a camp at Algidum. Hereupon the people in an uproare took the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to reſign up their authority again to new Conſuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or deſire to revenge old loſſes drew the Romans into a new war againſt the Veientes and their adherents, upon whom, having tried their forces with diverſity of Captaines, and variety of event, they vanquiſhed the Faliſci, and the Fidenates, and utterly ſubdued the Veientes. In conquering the Faliſci, Furius Camillus ſhewed no leſſe integrity than fortitude. For when a Schoolmaſter, by traiterouſly brought into the Roman camp, many children of the principall Citizens, thought to betray the Town, yeelding them all up as hoſtages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Souldiers, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forthwith yeelded unto him in reverence of his juſtice. The ſiege of Veii was ten yeers, and troubleſome, that the Romans were there firſt inforced to winter abroad under Tents (to which they were the more eaſily induced, becauſe then firſt they received pay) and to make vowes never to return without victory.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got ſo large ſpoils, that they conſecrated the tenths to Apollo Pythius: and the whole people in generall were called to the ranſacking of the City. But yet they were no leſſe unthankfull to Camillus for his ſervice, than before they had been to Coriolanus; for they baniſhed him the City, upon ſome occaſion of inequality in dividing the ſpoiles: yet he requited their unkindneſſe with ſome peece of ſervice againſt the fury of the Gaules; who being a populous Country, and very healthfull, the fathers (as ſometimes now) lived ſo long, that the ſons, deſtitute of meanes, were enforced to roave abroad, ſeeking ſome place where to ſet up their reſt: and withall being a Nation vaſte in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italy, fell upon Cluſium a Town in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information, (and being carefull of her Confederate Towns) ſent Embaſſadours, warning them to deſiſt from ſuch injurious enterpriſes. But the barbarous people, not regarding the meſſage, upon ſome injurie offered by the Roman Embaſſadours, converted their forces from Cluſium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the ſixteenth day before the Calends of Auguſt (which day was after branded for unluckie, and called Allienſis in the Roman Kalendar) they haſtned towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of miſery and deſolation. For ſome leaving the City; ſome creeping into holes; Prieſts hiding their reliques; and every one ſhifting for himſelf as the enemy came; Rome was abandoned as indefenſible. The Veſtall Virgins, in this tumult, were ſafely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldneſſe out of deſperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did ſet themſelves in Thrones, in their ſeverall houſes, hourly expecting the meſſengers of death, and meaning to dye, as they had lived, in State. The younger ſort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitall.

By this the Gaules were entred the City, who ſeeing all quiet, at firſt ſuſpected ſome ambuſh; afterward finding all ſecure, they fell to the ſpoile, committing all to the fire and ſword. As for the old Senatours, they ſate in their Majeſty with a grave reſolution, having first reverenced them as gods, anon they tried whether they would die like men. When the City was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitall: which held them work for the space of seven moneths. Once they were like to have surprised it by night, but being descried by the gagling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gaules being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gaules should take a thousand pound weight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in weighing, the Gaules, with open insolency, made their weights too heavie: Brennus their Captain, casting his sword into the ballance, and with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gaules with such violence, that he dispersed their troups, quenched the fire of the City with their bloud, forcing them to restore the spoiles with advantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which they had lately been so nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he so hotly pursued them thorow a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight slew a severall Champion of the Gaules) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accounted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their City, were earnestly bent to go to the Veii to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veii they changed their government from Consuls to military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeers, was by civill dissention interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchy. Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled again, till after many yeers expired, the Consular authority was established, it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwaies be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365. yeers. And now Rome, by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares set forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirty miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselves subjects to Rome, and undergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtain protection; which the Romans, although both Countries had been their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should devour the lesse, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Towns, but especially Capua it self, the faireſt City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papyrii and Fabii were most imployed in the managing of this War, which endured the space of fifty yeers. And in this season were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumius were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominy: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but lesse warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long war it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines began to challenge equall freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yeerly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latines was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colony; besides all which, they made offer to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. So a great battell was fought between them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius

Manlius Torquatus and the elder Decius were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the Generall in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consull exposed his life to the enemy, and purchased victory (as was beleeved) by his death. In which kind of devoting himself for his Army, the son of this Decius being after Consull, did imitate his father in the Hetrurian war. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchased victory, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a religion, as required the lives of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Country. The discipline of Manlius was no less resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caused his own son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Latines, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latines, the Æqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to try their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consull, wasting all their Country with fire and sword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made triall of the Roman arms, were the Tarentines and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as mediatours between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War, unto that party which should dare to refuse peace by them tendred. These threats which discovered their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadours unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadours, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebell and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their own weaknesse. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aid (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already in a manner it did over-spread.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battells.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive war upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Towns, with the remainder of his Fathers Army and treasures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imployment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other aid than his good conduct, which to obtain, they would cast themselves under his protection. They had in their companie some of the Samnites, Lucanians, Messapians, and others, which promised, in behalf of their severall Nations, as much as could be desired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as far as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and that by one victory open the gate unto another. To which effect it is said, that once he answered Cyneas his chief Counsellour, asking what he meant to doe after every of the victories which he hoped to get: that having won Rome, he would soon be Master of all Italy; that, after Italy he would quickly get the Isle of Sicil; that, out of Sicill, he would passe over into Affrick, and win Carthage, with all the rest of the Country; and being strengthened with the force of all these Provinces, he would be too hard for any of those that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all. Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Nevertheless, this Italian expedition seemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of such consequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almost thirty thousand men, well sorted, and well trained souldiers: part of which he sent over before him under Cyneas, with the rest he followed in person. At his coming, he found the Tarentines, very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, utterly careless to provide for the war. Wherefore he was fain to shut up their Theater, and other places of pleasure and resort, enforcing them to take armes, and making such a strict muster, as was to them very unpleasing, though greatly behooving to their estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Lævinus the Roman Consul drew neer, and began to waste Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Country; the Samnites were careless of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themselves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their valour was little: all of these had been accustomed to shrink for feare of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own forces, than the issue of their vaunting promises. He was now driven either to set forward with those that himself had brought into Italy, and the assistance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his own sufficiency, which by all meanes he was carefull to uphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolved to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom he proudly marched.

Lævinus the Consul was not affrighted with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battell ere all his adherents should be ready to joyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slackenesse of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger most concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrell between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arrive at his Camp; or whether, considering better at neer distance, the weight of the businesse which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour; the short answer that was returned to his proposition, gave him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans sent him this word, that they had neither chosen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.
